

IN 3671 .S4 P5 c.1
nto, Vivian de Sola r Charles Sedley, 1639-1701

LIBRARY
DENTON
TEXAS

T773-227-10m.

TEXAS WOMAN

Date Due

45

SIR CHARLES SEDLEY

IN PREPARATION

THE POETICAL AND DRAMATIC WORKS

of

SIR CHARLES SEDLEY

Collected and edited from the Old Editions. With a Preface on the Text and Textual and Explanatory Notes by
V. DE S. PINTO.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2022 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

Sir Charles Sedley, Bart.

Emery Walker ph. sc.

SIR CHARLES SEDLEY

1639—1701

A Study in the Life and Literature of the Restoration

BY

V. DE SOLA PINTO

M.A., D.PHIL. (OXON.)

PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE IN THE UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, SOUTHAMPTON

NEW YORK: BONI AND LIVERIGHT
LONDON: CONSTABLE AND COMPANY, LTD.

1927

All rights reserved.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN BY RICHARD CLAY & SONS, LIMITED, BUNGAY, SUFFOLK.

TO
G. THORN DRURY, Esq., M.A., K.C.
WITHOUT WHOSE GENEROUS HELP
THIS BOOK COULD NEVER HAVE BEEN WRITTEN

35347

CONTENTS

PART I

THE LIFE OF SIR CHARLES SEDLEY

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| GENEALOGICAL TABLE | X |
| INTRODUCTION | 3 |
| CHAP. I. THE SEDLEY FAMILY, 1337-1639 | 15 |
| II. THE SEDLEYS DURING THE CIVIL WAR AND UNDER THE COMMONWEALTH | 27 |
| III. THE WITS AND THEIR FROLICS | 51 |
| IV. THE WITS AS MEN OF LETTERS | 77 |
| V. TRAVEL, FRIENDSHIPS AND THE DRAMA | 96 |
| VI. KATHERINE SAVAGE AND OTHERS | 120 |
| VII. THE END OF THE SOCIETY OF WITS | 141 |
| VIII. SIR CHARLES SEDLEY IN PARLIAMENT, 1668-1701 | 175 |
| IX. THE SEDLEYS AFTER THE REVOLUTION | 202 |

PART II

THE WORKS OF SIR CHARLES SEDLEY

| | |
|---|-----|
| I. THE PLAYS | 245 |
| II. THE NON-DRAMATIC WORKS | 282 |
| APPENDIX I. DOCUMENTS ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF SIR CHARLES SEDLEY | 305 |
| „ II. A NOTE ON SIR CHARLES SEDLEY'S LIBRARY | 324 |

Contents

viii

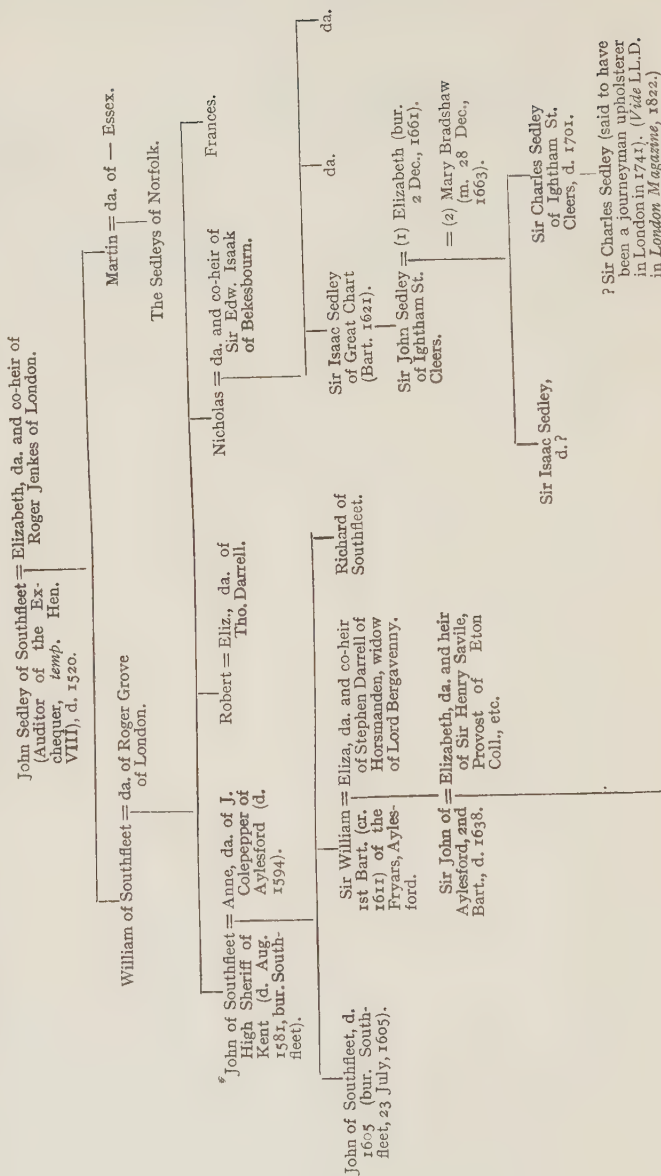

PAGE

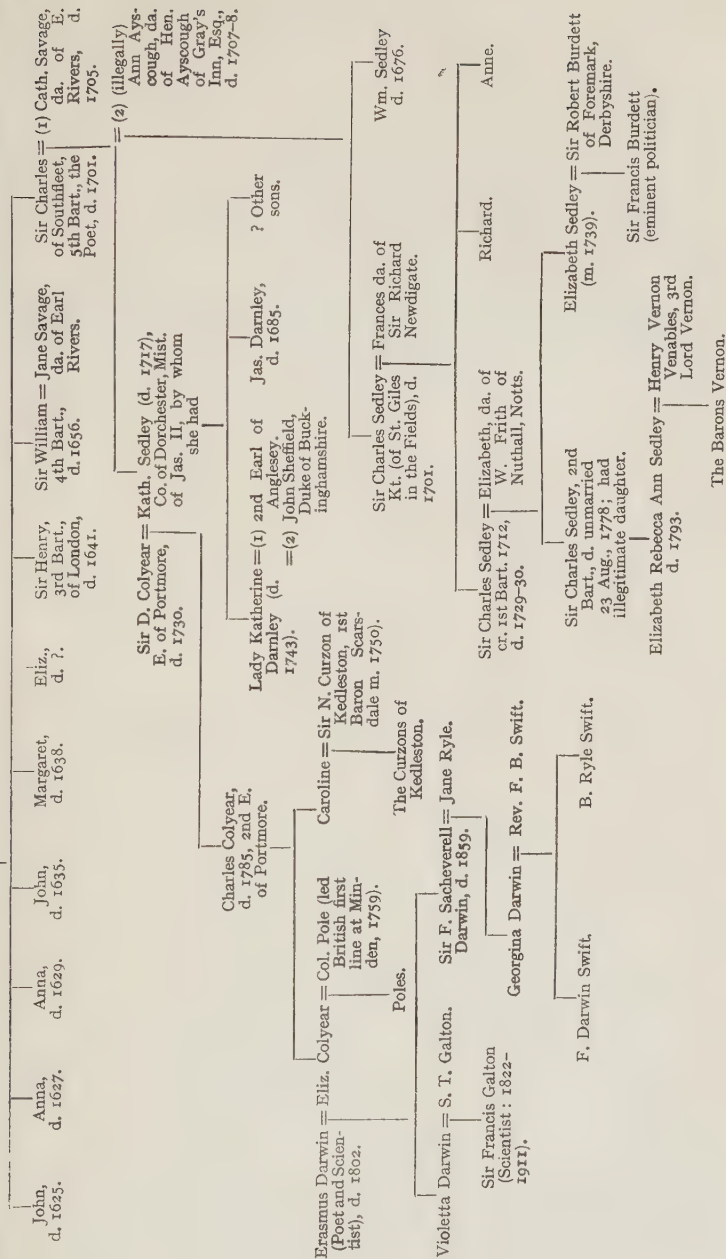

| | | |
|-----------------|--|-----|
| APPENDIX III. | DOCUMENTS ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF KATHERINE SEDLEY, COUNTESS OF DORCHESTER | 345 |
| „ | IV. PRINCIPAL MANUSCRIPT SOURCES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY | 363 |
| INDEX | | 389 |

ILLUSTRATIONS

- I. SIR CHARLES SEDLEY Frontispiece
From a painting, by an unknown hand, at Knole Park, Kent. (By kind permission of Lord Sackville of Knole.)
[Photograph by Emery Walker.]
- II. KATHERINE SEDLEY, COUNTESS OF DORCHESTER Facing page
132
From a Mezzotint by Faber, after Lely. (Reproduced by kind permission of Mr. G. Thorn Drury.)
[Photograph by Emery Walker.]

Pedigree of the Sedley Family derived from the pedigrees in the British Museum (Add. MS. 33920 f. 69 b), the pedigree in the Bodleian (MS. Rawl. B. 82), a pedigree compiled by Mr. F. Darwin Swift, F.R.Hist.Soc., of Denstone College, Stafford, who kindly placed it at the disposal of the author; also from G.E.C.'s "Complete Baronetage" (IV. 187) and from MS. notes belonging to the late Col. Prideaux and now in the possession of Mr. G. Thorn Drury, K.C.

PART I

THE LIFE OF SIR CHARLES SEDLEY

“It would be a Task few Men of Modesty would undertake, viz. to Write the Life of this Person. . . .”—“Some Account of the Life of Sir Charles Sedley” by “an Eminent Hand,” prefixed to the edition of 1722.

INTRODUCTION

SIR CHARLES SEDLEY has been badly treated by posterity both as a man and a poet. His life has been overshadowed by a single scandalous episode of his youth, and his works have been judged from faulty and dishonest editions published many years after his death. The object of the present study is to do him tardy justice by means of a detailed biography, largely derived from sources which have not been used by the authors of previous memoirs, and a critical account of his writings, based on the essential foundation of a complete and scientific bibliography. That he was the author of some of the best songs of his age and the friend of Dryden would alone be sufficient reasons for undertaking such a work. There is a further justification in the fact that he is a good representative of an interesting and widely misunderstood phase in the evolution of English society. He is typical of those Wits and Poets of the Restoration, who have hitherto been regarded merely as selfish libertines, but who are now being shown by a more careful and sympathetic study to have played an important part in building up the fine aristocratic culture of the eighteenth century. If any apology is due for the insertion of a somewhat detailed account of the career of Sir Charles's daughter, Katherine Sedley, Countess of Dorchester, in the present work, it may be pleaded that a biography of the poet without some mention of that lady would be unthinkable, while the interest attached to her own character and the extraordinary part which she played in English history demand that her doings should be recorded as fully as possible.

Although no detailed biography of Sir Charles Sedley has hitherto appeared, a great number of short memoirs have been published during the last two hundred years. Their authors have usually confined themselves to giving an account of the most scandalous episode of the poet's youth, and relating a few other anecdotes which have given currency to a sharply outlined portrait or rather caricature of a very wicked and witty baronet whose life was chiefly spent in debauchery and the coining of smart repartees. By co-ordinating these stories with other records which have hitherto been inaccessible or overlooked, I have attempted to replace this conventional picture by one which is at once more complex and truer to life, and which may help to explain the curious fact that the ringleader of the debauch at Oxford Kate's was also capable of the delicate beauty of such poems as "Not Celia, that I jüster am" and "Phyllis is my only Joy," and the manly good sense of the Parliamentary speeches.

The earliest printed account of Sir Charles Sedley is that of Gerard Langbaine on p. 485 of his "Account of the English Dramatic Poets," published during the poet's lifetime (Oxford, 1691). It contains nothing but a little flattery, two quotations, from Rochester and Shadwell (the former of which was to be repeated ad nauseam by subsequent biographers) and a brief list and description of Sedley's plays. Charles Gildon's "The Lives and Character of the English Dramatick Poets. . . . First begun by Mr. Langbain, improved and continued down to this time by a careful Hand" (London, 1698), includes an even briefer notice of the same character. Anthony à Wood, who knew Sedley personally, wrote a "Life" of the poet some time before his death in 1695,¹ which he did not, however, publish in the first edition of his "Athenæ Oxonienses" (Oxford, 1691),¹ perhaps for fear of giving offence to Sir Charles, who was still alive. It first appeared in the second edition (London, 1721) and contains a detailed account of the Bow Street affair and some amusing gossip about the trial which followed it, besides a fairly accurate list of Sedley's published works up to about 1690. Aubrey, the other great scandalmonger of the age, unfortunately left no life of Sedley, but only a tantalising sentence describing his personal appearance.¹

¹ The notes which Wood made for this "Life" are to be found among his Diaries, together with other references to Sedley. They are printed in Clark's "Life and Times of Anthony à Wood," and are referred to in footnotes to the body of the present study.

In 1702, the year after Sir Charles's death, his "affinity,"² Captain William Ayloffe, published an edition of his Miscellaneous Works, but his Preface to the Reader does not throw much light on the poet's life. In 1719 a compilation of short literary biographies, called "Giles Jacob's Poetical Register," appeared, with a very brief notice of Sedley and a list of his plays. Passing over the genealogical notes in Collins's "Baronetage" (1720), we come to "Some Account of Sir Charles Sedley" prefixed to the first volume of the duodecimo edition of the Works published by Samuel Briscoe in 1722. The title-page states that this "Account" is by "an Eminent Hand," and for once this familiar ascription has a certain amount of truth, for the "Eminent Hand" may have been that of no less a person than Daniel Defoe.³ Whether the author of this memoir had any acquaintance with Sir Charles is doubtful. The "Account" reads like a collection of gossip, picked up at taverns and coffee-houses. It contains few dates, a good deal of flattery, and, perhaps, a little irony. For instance, the opening sentence, "It would be a Task few Men of Modesty would undertake, viz. to Write the Life of this Person," would appear from the context to mean that a description of Sir Charles's dazzling "parts" was beyond the power of an ordinary mortal. It might, however, bear another interpretation, when applied to the hero of the Bow Street frolic. Again, "he appeared in Publick much about the Year 1663," may be an innocent mistake as to the date of his first appearance at Court (which was probably earlier), or it may be a sly allusion to the Bow Street affair, a very "publick" kind of appearance, which took place in that very year, and to which there is no overt reference in the "Account." Perhaps the ironical tone of this memoir gave offence. Some copies of the 1722 edition do not contain it, although they announce it on the title-page, so it is possible that it was suppressed.¹ Its chief value lies in the traditions which it preserves of Sir Charles's relations with King Charles II, which may well be authentic,² and the story of his famous remark on the Revolution, of which it gives the earliest and most plausible version.³

¹ See p. 43.

² See p. 164.

³ On the verso of the last leaf of "The Second Part of Whipping Tom, or a Road for a Proud Lady" (Briscoe, London, 1722), there is an advertisement of the 1722 Sedley which ends "with Memoirs of the Author by Mr. D'Foe." I am indebted to Mr. G. Thorn Drury, K.C., for permission to publish this fact, which he discovered and communicated to me.

The so-called "Lives of the Poets of Great Britain and Ireland, by Mr. Cibber and other Hands" (London, 1753), chiefly written by Robert Shiels,⁴ contains a notice of Sedley which has a certain interest, as the first attempt to combine the accounts of Wood and Defoe. Its author had, however, overlooked two important references to the poet, which had appeared in ¹ It is equally possible that it was not ready for publication at the appointed time, and was only inserted in later copies. It was certainly inserted after the rest of the book was made up, for its first leaf is signed A2, a repetition of the signature of the first leaf of the dedication, which precedes it, and in some copies this signature is blacked out in ink. But it is impossible to say whether it was withdrawn from later issues, or not inserted in early ones.

² See pp. 54-56.

³ See p. 174.

⁴ See Sir W. Raleigh's "Six Essays on Johnson," pp. 119, 120.

John Dennis's "Original Letters" in 1721, and the "Works and Life of The Right Honourable Charles Earl of Halifax" in 1725. "Biographia Britannica," the most worthy attempt of the eighteenth century at a Dictionary of National Biography (London, 1747-66), includes the fullest and most accurate account of Sedley which had hitherto appeared. Its author draws on several sources besides the memoir by Wood and the "Account" prefixed to the edition of 1722.

Johnson's collection of the English Poets (first edition, 1779) contains no Life of Sedley and no selection from his works. This exclusion seems astonishing in a collection where such poetasters as Stepney and Pomfret were given places. If it was made on moral grounds, it is difficult to see why Rochester and Dorset should have been included, but perhaps their titles recommended them to the book-sellers who controlled the publication, while the memory of the Bow Street affair had surrounded Sedley's name with a sulphurous odour which might have alarmed their clients.¹ The Life of Dorset,

¹ Curiously enough, Johnson seems to have forgotten the Sedley family on another occasion, recorded by Fanny Burney in her Diary ("Diary and Letters," ed. Dobson, I. 57). Speaking to Mr. Seward in August 1778, he quoted the lines:

"lies buried here
So early wise, so lasting fair,
That none, unless her years you told,
Thought her a child or thought her old."

He prefaced the quotation with the remark, "I remember an epitaph to the purpose, which is in—(I have quite forgot what, and also the name it was made upon, but the rest I recollect distinctly)." The lines are from Waller's Epitaph on the Lady Sedley (Sir Charles Sedley's mother): see p. 27. That Johnson was well acquainted with Sedley's career is shown by the well-known line in the "Vanity of Human Wishes":

"And Sedley curs'd the form which pleas'd a king."

The "form" must be that of Lady Dorchester, but "Sedley" may however, contains a full account of the Bow Street affair, and incidentally mentions the part played by Sedley on that occasion. David Erskine Baker's "A Companion to the Playhouse" (1764) and its successor "Biographia Dramatica" (1782) contain articles on Sedley, which include no new matter, but correct some of the grosser errors of former biographers. Early editions of Dr. Granger's interesting "Biographical History" (1769-74, 1775) contain a short life of Katherine Sedley, but none of her father. In Noble's enlarged edition of this work (1806) there is a short account of Sir Charles which does not add materially to our knowledge of the poet. In addition to these printed memoirs, there have survived from the eighteenth century some valuable MS. notes made by William Oldys in his interleaved copy of Langbaine (Brit. Mus. c. 28, g),¹ while an interesting defence of his works appeared in Dr. J. Langhorne's "Effusions of Fancy and Friendship" in 1763. It may be mentioned in passing that Oldys's notes were known to Malone, who made use of them in a footnote on Sedley on p. 63 of his "Life of Dryden," prefixed to his edition of that author's Prose Works (1800). Malone was also the first editor of Dryden to make the very important identification of Sedley with the "Lisideius" of the "Essay of Dramatic Poesy."² refer either to the father or the daughter. It is generally taken in the latter sense, but Mrs. Jane West in a letter to the Gentleman's Magazine of April 1800 contended that it refers to Sir Charles. Johnson was asked the meaning of the line by Anna Seward a few months before his death; he replied: "I knew at the time I wrote the poem, but the history has since escaped my recollection" (Gentleman's Magazine, April 1800).

¹ These notes are reproduced in full in Appendix I, pp. 318-320.

² For which he was somewhat foolishly jeered at in a squib called "Essence of Malone" by George Hardinge, the judge and antiquary, writing under the name of "Minutius Felix" (London, 1800).

In 1822 a long article entitled "Memoirs of Sir Charles Sedley" was printed in the London Magazine (September 1822, Vol. VI. pp. 265-72). It consists of an elaborate (but not entirely correct) genealogical account of the Sedley family and a life of Sir Charles, concocted from the printed eighteenth-century memoirs and Oldys's notes, together with one tradition which had appeared in a topographical work published in 1800.¹ Its author, who signs himself LL.D., acknowledges indebtedness only to Giles Jacob and "Cibber," and concludes with the remark, that "much (more information) is not, I am satisfied, now to be obtained." A month after the appearance of LL.D.'s article, the Gentleman's Magazine published a most valuable note on Sedley, entitled "Fly Leaves No. IV, Sir Charles Sedley the Poet," and signed "Eu. Hood." "Hood" corrects the chief errors of LL.D., and cites some notable allusions to Sedley in seventeenth-century newspapers, as well as a description of some legal documents which throw considerable light on the poet's life. The author of this article was Joseph Haslewood, the well-known antiquary and writer on stage history (1769-1833), whose interleaved copy of "Giles Jacob's Poetical Register" (Brit. Mus. C. 45, d) contains MS. notes of even greater importance than those made by Oldys in the previous century. In 1855 John Heneage Jesse published his interesting "Memoirs of the Court of England during the Reign of the Stuarts." The third volume contains a memoir of Sedley based on Anthony à Wood, Cibber, the Memoir prefixed to the Edition of 1722, and Oldys's MS. notes. In the same volume there is an account of the Countess of Dorchester, in which several amusing anecdotes are preserved.

Macaulay's "History of England" (1859) was the first work to draw attention to the importance of Sedley's parliamentary career, but no biography of note appeared after Jesse's work, till the publication of the "Dictionary of National Biography" in the 'nineties. Sir A. W. Ward's article in the Dictionary is derived from the usual printed sources, but also includes certain new material which had appeared during the nineteenth century, the most notable being the numerous references in the complete edition of Pepys's Diary. No use, however, is made of the MS. notes of Oldys and Haslewood, and certain important details, such as the poet's separation from his wife, his relations with Ann Ayscough, and the place of his death, are not mentioned. Moreover, Sir A. W. Ward had, apparently, overlooked the interesting letter from Sedley to the second Earl of Chesterfield, preserved in the Earl's MS. letter book (Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 19,253) and printed, somewhat incorrectly, in his "Correspondence" (London, 1829).

¹ Lysons's "Parishes of Middlesex, not Described in the Environs of London" (London, 1800): see p. 53.

The inadequate article in the Dictionary was to some extent supplemented by an interesting correspondence in Notes and Queries extending over some eleven years (1890-1901), when much new information concerning Sedley was contributed to that journal by the late Col. W. F. Prideaux, Mr. Gordon Goodwin and others. Prideaux was a stout defender of Sedley, and the first critic to throw real light on the bibliography of the poems. He contemplated writing a life of the poet, and collected some valuable notes for that purpose which have, since his death, passed into the hands of Mr. G. Thorn Drury, K.C., who has generously placed them at the disposal of the present writer.

Articles on Sedley by Sir Edmund Gosse in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and other contemporary compilations merely reproduce the biographical details given by the "Dictionary of National Biography," while Mr. Charles Whibley in the "Cambridge History of English Literature" confines himself to some excellent critical remarks on the poems.

At the opening of the present century two German scholars devoted some attention to Sedley. In 1904, Edmund Plückhahn chose the "Foreign Influences" on Sedley's comedies as the subject of a thesis for the Doctorate of Philosophy at Rostock.¹ He prefixes a short biography to his essay, but it contains no information beyond that which is contained in the "Dictionary of National Biography." A learned air is given to this work by the multitude of authorities which are quoted in the footnotes, but as they consist chiefly of modern English and German text-books on English literature, they do not actually testify to anything except the industry of the author.² Plückhahn's remarks on the comedies are based not on the original editions but on the very untrustworthy text of Briscoe's edition of the Works (1722).

In 1905 Max Lissner published a thesis for the doctorate in the University of Leipzig. It claims to describe "Sir Charles Sedley's Leben und Werke."³ The biographical section of this work is derived from the more obvious printed sources such as the eighteenth-century memoirs, Sir A. W. Ward's article, and the references in Pepys and Macaulay. Its author had clearly never heard of the articles in the London and Gentleman's Magazines, and still less of the notes of Oldys and Haslewood and the letter to Lord Chesterfield. His critical essay is one stage further removed from reality than that of his compatriot, for it is founded on the 1776 reprint of the bad text of 1722, and this reprint seems to be the only edition which he has consulted. He is thus led to cite in support of his views poems which are probably not from Sedley's pen at all.

¹ "Die Bearbeitung ausländischer Stoffe im englischen Drama am Ende des 17 Jahrhunderts dargelegt an Sir Charles Sedley's The Mulberry Garden und Bellamira or the Mistress . . . von Edmund Plückhahn aus Hamburg." 1904.

² An amusing instance of Dr. Plückhahn's methods is shown in his footnote on the date of Sedley's death. After remarking, "Ueber das Todesjahr Sedley's herrschen sehr schwankende Angaben," he quotes different authorities for different years: for 1722, Baker's "Companion to the Playhouse" (1764); for 1728, one modern English and two modern German Histories of English Literature; for 1701, the "Biographia Dramatica" of 1811, Sir A. W. Ward's "History of English Dramatic Literature," Chambers's "Cyclopædia of English Literature," and three less well known English and American text-books. So 1701 wins by a show of hands! Without troubling about parish registers, Dr. Plückhahn might have glanced at the "Brief Relation" of Narcissus Luttrell, Sedley's contemporary (which had been in print since 1857), where he would have found the exact date.

³ "Sir Charles Sedley's Leben und Werke . . . von Max Lissner." Halle, 1905.

Finally, Mr. E. Beresford-Chancellor has published an account of Sedley's life and writings in his "Lives of the Rakes" (Philip Allan, London, 1924). Mr. Chancellor is the first biographer to make some use of the records of Sedley preserved in Luttrell's "Brief Relation" and the Reports of the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts, but he is apparently unaware that examples of Sedley's correspondence exist, and he has completely overlooked the events connected with the poet's separation from his wife, to cite only two important omissions, whilst he accepts such unauthenticated stories as the collapse of the theatre roof at the first performance of "Bellamira" quite uncritically.¹ Sedley's biographers have not been impeccable, but it may be urged in their defence that it was not easy to find out much about the Restoration wits during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. There was a mass of rather unreliable gossip and a little printed correspondence. Many of the documents that are now available were then inaccessible, and very few original letters were at the disposal of the biographer. Unfortunately, Sedley has left even less correspondence than his friends Rochester and Etherege. His few extant letters are included in the present work, but most of the biography has had to be pieced together from a variety of sources, such as allusions in contemporary correspondence, journals, newspapers, dedications, official records and legal documents. For the discovery of many of these and, above all, for their invaluable advice and assistance, I am deeply indebted to Professor Sir Charles H. Firth and Mr. G. Thorn Drury, K.C., who have generously placed at my disposal the treasures of their libraries and the still richer treasures of their learning and experience. I wish especially to record the fact that Mr. Thorn Drury allowed me to make use of his interleaved and annotated copy of the 1776 edition of Sedley's Works, and gratefully to acknowledge the immense help which I have derived from his MS. notes in that copy. I desire to express my sincere thanks to Lord Sackville of Knole Park, Kent, the descendant of Sedley's friend, the Earl of Dorset, and to Sir F. Newdigate, Bart., of Arbury, Warwickshire, for their generous permission to read and copy the Sedley MSS. in their possession, to the Rev. Montague Summers for lending me his important MS. notes on Sedley's plays, to Mr. W. J. Lawrence for some helpful advice on theatrical matters, to Professor G. S. Gordon, Mr. D. Nichol Smith, Mr. H. F. Brett Smith, Mr. J. Isaacs, and Mr. A. C. Harwood, for a multitude of most useful hints and suggestions, to Dr. H. J. Spenser, who read my work in manuscript, to Professor R. M. Hewitt, who read the proofs, to the many ladies and gentlemen who sent me valuable information on the appearance of my article entitled "Some Notes on Sir Charles Sedley" in the Times Literary Supplement of November 22, 1922, and, finally, to the various officials in Public Libraries and collections of Archives both in England and France who have met the heavy demands which I have made upon their patience with long-suffering kindness and courtesy. I desire to add to this list the names of two persons who, although they have given me no direct help in the work of research, have nevertheless a very real share in whatever merits this study may possess. They are those of Mr. Percy Simpson, Fellow of Oriel College, Oxon, who taught me the meaning of honest and discerning scholarship, and the late Professor Sir Walter Raleigh, who loved the poets of the Restoration for their wit and their gaiety and who often talked to me about them in his inspiring way during the last years of his life. The inception of this work was indeed due to the advice and encouragement of that great English scholar and gentleman.

¹ See p. 147.

CHAPTER I

THE SEDLEY FAMILY, 1337-1639

"This Family (of very good Antiquity in the County of Kent). . ."—Collins's "Baronetage," 1720 (I. 327).

THE Sedleys, or Sidleys,¹ of Kent were one of the many families who emerged from their original obscurity during the great social revolution which changed the England of the Middle Ages into the England of the modern world. The story of their rise, decline and disappearance begins amid the mists of the late Middle Ages, reaches its climax at the Court of Charles II, where the poet squandered the wealth acquired by the patience of generations, and closes in the calm of the eighteenth century, when the Sedley family, as though exhausted by the effort of producing a poet and a royal mistress, sank back once more into the comfortable and undistinguished position among the landed gentry held by its ancestors two hundred years before. That such an astounding meteor as Sir Charles should have suddenly appeared in a line of respectable squires and lawyers seems at first glance one of the puzzles of heredity, and only explicable by the profound remark of Don Brid'Oison, that "On est toujours le fils de quelqu'un." A close study of the family history, however, shows that the poet was a true Sedley in almost every respect, and probably his most surprising actions were merely the result of qualities which his ancestors had possessed in a less conspicuous form. His extravagance and his love of letters were almost certainly inherited, while it seems likely that the strong fundamental sanity which had built up the fortunes of his Kentish forefathers remained at the base of his character and enabled him to weather the storm of Restoration profligacy better both in health and in purse than many other courtiers, and to save for his descendants a respectable remnant of the family property. Therefore, although the Sedleys of the eighteenth century had lost their ancestors' place among the magnates of Kent, it was possible for them to retain their rank among the land-owning caste in another part of the country, and thus, although the male line has long been extinct, their blood has been mingled with that of other distinguished families and has run in the veins of eminent men of our own day.¹

¹ There are many spellings of the name. Here are some specimens found by the present writer: Sedley, Sedle, Sedlye, Sedlay, Sedelay, Sidley, Sidly, Sidlie, Sydley, Sydly, Cidley, Chidley, Sidelay and even Chelzey. The last four, it should be added, are the versions of the Frenchmen, Bonrépaulx, Barillon and Dangeau. Malone favoured Sidley (Dryden's Prose Works (1800), I. 64), and cites the grants of the titles to Sir William Sidley in 1611 and to Katherine Sidley in 1687, and the dedication of the "Mulberry Garden" (1668). On the other hand, he admits that "at a later period of his life the poet called himself Sedley" (i.e. later than the "Mulberry Garden"). Haslewood pleads as strongly for Sedley: "I have seen two original autographs of the poet and several of his descendants and they wrote their names indisputably Sedley. In all the old Deeds from the time of Charles the 1st the name is uniformly spelt Sedley" (MS. notes to Jacob's "Poetical Register," see Appendix I, p. 320). As the present writer has seen six original signatures of the poet all of which are unquestionably Charles Sedley—to say nothing of transcripts of the wills of Sir Charles and Sir John where the same form is found—he is convinced that Haslewood was right. Nevertheless the form Sidley (Sydley, etc.) was undoubtedly sometimes used, and Malone was perfectly justified in deriving Dryden's "Lisideius" from it. It may have been a phonetic spelling representing a current pronunciation. In the seventeenth century the values of the short i and e were probably not so sharply distinguished as they are to-day.

¹ The Sedley pedigree (see pp. x, xi) is of extraordinary interest and might furnish material for a monograph by a student of heredity. For some acute remarks on the subject see Professor Karl Pearson's "Life of Sir Francis Galton" (Cambridge, 1914), I. 20, 21. Galton himself was a direct descendant of Sir Charles Sedley: see Pedigree.

The original home of the Sedleys seems to have been the low-lying coast around the border of Kent and Sussex. Part of Romney Marsh was formerly called Sidley's Marsh,¹ and the name still survives in the hamlet of Sidley's Green near Bexhill. In the fourteenth century a branch of the family migrated to North Kent, and built a house in the village of Scadbury, or Scotbury, near Southfleet, where, in the middle of the seventeenth century,² their arms and the date 1337 were still visible in an old wainscot. 1337 Other Sedleys seem to have continued to live on the south coast, for, during the fifteenth century, the name is frequently found among those of the most prominent citizens of Rye and other towns in the neighbourhood.³ The early history of the Southfleet branch has not been recorded, but it may be supposed that, like many another family of small landowners, it profited considerably by the decay of the old nobility during the fifteenth century. When we next catch sight of the Sedleys of Southfleet they are people of some importance in the fertile country to the south-west of London.

¹ Philipot's "Villare Cantianum or Kent Surveyed and Illustrated," London, 1659, p. 330.

² Philipot writes ("Villare Cantianum," p. 330): "In this mansion (Scadbery) there is a Room whose sides are covered with Wainscot, and on one of the Plates or Pains the arms of Sydley are carved in embost work . . . with the year of the Lord affixed in figures, whose date commences from 1337. And although the Structure of the House hath, like a Snail, shifted its ancient shell, yet in all its Mutations and Vicissitudes, which must certainly have very much disordered the Fabrick, when it was cast into a new mould or frame, and ravelled and discomposed the Materials: yet this Panel of Wainscot hath been like a Relique, religiously preserved to justifie not only the antiquity of the Seat but of the Family of Sydley also, which is presumed to have been resident at this place, before the above-mentioned calculation: from whom Sir Charles Sidley Baronet claims the original of his title to this mansion and his extraction or pedigree likewise untwisted into many Descents and now at last wound up in him."

³ Records of the Corporations of Rye and neighbouring towns. Hist. MSS. Comm., Appendix to 5th Report, pp. 490, 491, 499, 529, 530.

John Sedley of Southfleet (flor. temp. Henry VII, Henry VIII) is the first member of the family whose personality can be recognised with any distinctness and he has a good claim to be considered its founder. He is said ¹ to have been educated at Exeter College, Oxford. Afterwards he was bred to the Law, entering 1503-20 the Middle Temple on 3 July, 1503, where he was one of the Masters of the Revels elected there at Christmas 1515/16.² He rose high in his profession, reaching the important position of Auditor of the Exchequer to Henry VIII,³ and he is supposed to have been employed to extract money and land from the Church. It is probable that, in common with most of Henry's tools, he profited considerably by the confiscation of the ecclesiastical property, and perhaps one of the original sources of the wealth of the Sedleys was the spoil which fell to the Auditor's share when the monasteries were dissolved.⁴ Apparently he was on intimate terms with the King, for he jousted with him at Greenwich in May 1516.⁵ He died in 1520, and was buried in Southfleet Church. A superb memorial brass covers his tomb, and preserves a wonderful portrait of a shrewd-featured old man and his wife, dressed in rich robes.⁶ John Sedley inaugurated

¹ By LL.D. in the London Magazine, September 1822 (see Introduction, p. 9). There is no trace of a John Sedley, or Sydley, in the registers of Exeter College or of the University.

² "Middle Temple Records" (ed. Hopwood, London, 1904), I. 7, 148.

³ Brewer's "Letters and Papers of the Reign of Henry VIII," I. 2, 1084.

⁴ LL.D. states that he received the Manor of Southfleet, but this must be a mistake, as, according to Philipot ("Villare Cantianum," p. 329), this Manor was retained by the Crown till the reign of Elizabeth, who granted it to a certain William Peter of Wrettle. It was by him sold to Sir William Sedley, grandfather of the poet. However, LL.D. is doubtless right in supposing that John Sedley received grants of land from Henry VIII.

⁵ Cal. State Papers Dom., 8 Henry VIII, Pt. I.

⁶ Rubbing, Brit. Mus., Add. MSS. 32490, SS, 33.

in three respects the policy which his descendants were to pursue for several generations. He married an heiress, daughter of a London citizen; he invested his money in purchases of land, and he made liberal bequests to the college where he was educated at Oxford.¹ A black-letter copy of Lydgate's "Bochas" (perhaps Pynson's edition of 1494)² was among the books which probably belonged to Sir Charles Sedley the Poet, and it may well have been an heirloom. It is pleasant to imagine that it was once the property of the Auditor and that he had already a little of the strain of poetry which was one day to produce the songs of his descendant.

Martin, the younger of John Sedley's known sons, migrated to Norfolk, where he also married an heiress, and became the ancestor of the Sedleys of that county. The elder son, William, inherited the Kentish lands, and, following the example set by his father, married the daughter of a London citizen. He was High Sheriff of Kent under Edward VI,³ and is said to have added considerably to the estates. John, the eldest of his three sons, succeeded his father, and was a High Sheriff in the reign of Elizabeth.⁴ Nicholas, the youngest, married Jane, daughter of Sir Edward Isaak of Bekesbourn, on 13 May, 1560, at St. Botolph's Church, Bishopsgate.⁵ He was the ancestor of the Sedleys of Great Chart and Ightam St. Cleers, an important fact in the Sedley genealogy, and one which has hitherto been overlooked.⁶

John Sedley, the Sheriff, died in 1581.⁷ His eldest child, another John Sedley, inherited the property, but died childless in 1605.⁸ He was one of the Osrics of Elizabethan England—the first of the Sedleys to display something of the fecklessness that

¹ LL.D.

³ "Villare Cantianum," p. 31.

⁵ St. Botolph's Marriage Register.

⁷ Southfleet Burial Register.

² See p. 338.

⁴ Ibid., p. 33.

⁶ See Pedigree and p. 22.

⁸ Ibid.

appeared in many of the actions of Sir Charles and his children. Charity on a large scale was always a weakness of the family, and it seems to have come near to ruining John Sedley. Compelled "to go oversea" for debt caused by his "to lavish almes," 1601 in February 1601 he was travelling in Italy "without any man attendant." He is said to have "reade muche but not judicious," and was the first of the family to live at Aylesford, where the manor was granted to him by Elizabeth.¹ A contemporary says that he built a house there that "cost him £4000." He probably means that John Sedley spent that sum in converting the ancient priory of Aylesford into a dwelling-house.²

John Sedley's heir was his brother William, the most remarkable figure in the family between John Sedley the Auditor and Sir Charles the Poet. He was educated at Hart Hall and Balliol College, Oxford, where he graduated in February 1574/5, and proceeded M.A. in July 1577.³ Like his ancestor the 1574/75- Auditor, he entered the legal profession, and had a 1611 brilliant career at Lincoln's Inn, where he was Barrister-at-law in 1584 and Treasurer of the Inn in 1608.⁴ He was knighted on 30 August, 1605, and created a baronet by James I on 20 August, 1611.⁵ He married a titled widow, Lady Abergavenny,⁶ and by her had a single son, named John.

Sir William Sedley was a person of wealth, learning and munificence, a splendid type of the English

¹ "Villare Cantianum," p. 47.

² The above details of John Sedley's life are from John Manningham's Diary (ed. Camden Society, 1868), pp. 20, 21, s.d., February 1601. J. P. Collier cited the passages referring to John Sedley from Manningham's MS. in his "Personal Notes concerning Old Writers" (Brit. Mus., Add. MSS. 32382, f. 124). Collier writes that they refer to Sir Charles Sedley's father. It is clear, however, from the dates that the person described by Manningham is the poet's great-uncle.

³ "Alumni Oxonienses," p. 1356.

⁴ Ibid.

⁵ Ibid.

⁶ Hasted's "Kent," II. 170 (ed. 1782).

gentleman of the Renaissance. His "fair Habitation" of "the Fryars" at Aylesford—probably the mansion on which his hare-brained brother had spent so much money—and his princely generosity were famous throughout the county, where he was 'painefully and expencefully studious of the common good.'¹ He was so highly esteemed that in July 1616 he was¹⁶¹⁶ included in a Commission with the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Lord Admiral to inquire into the misemployment of lands and moneys bequeathed for charitable purposes in the county of Kent.² Aylesford owed to him a school, a hospital and a bridge, and Oxford the Sedleian Lecture in Natural Philosophy, which still preserves his name in his ancient University. He was a patron to John Owen, the ingenious Latin epigrammatist, who dedicated a book of his verses to him as one of his "Mæcenates,"³ and a friend to Sir Henry Savile, one of the greatest English scholars of the Renaissance, editor of St. Chrysostom, Warden of Merton and Provost of Eton. In the winter of 1612/13, London gossips were talking of a match^{1612/13}

¹ Philemon Holland's enlarged translation of Camden's "Britannia," London, 1610, p. 332.

² Cal. State Papers Dom., 1611-18, p. 387.

³ "Epigrammatum Ioannis Owen . . . Editio Secunda Londini," 1618, 8vo. Epigrams 4, 5, 45 and 99 in Book II are addressed to Sir William. I quote Nos. 4 and 5 in Thomas Harvey's English versions (from J. Owen's "Latin Epigrams Englished . . ." 8vo., 1677):

"To William Sedley, Knight and Baronet, &c.

Thy sundry languages, thy skill i' th' Laws,
Arts, Piety, sublime thee with applause.
Thy counsel many, poor thy money have;
This virtue leads the tourney to the brave;
Live so to Christ, thy Countrey, to thy King,
Thyself till Angels thee to glory bring.

To John Sedley, only Son of the aforementioned William Sedley.

Thou Janus art, but sole in name, now young;
Thy Father emulate in deed ere long,
Thou shalt be Janus, hard 'tis to precel
Thy Father, if thou equal'st him, 'tis well."

between John, only son of Sir William Sedley, and Elizabeth, Sir Henry Savile's younger daughter and co-heir, and at the beginning of February there was a "great meeting" at Sir Henry's house to discuss the proposal.¹ In spite of a tempting offer from the son of a peer, Elizabeth Savile was betrothed to John Sedley in 1613 and married in the same year.² Sir 1619 William died in March 1619, and his estates and title were inherited by his son, John, husband of Elizabeth Savile and father of the poet.

All genealogists of the Sedley family have been confused by the fact that, contemporary with this Sir John and Elizabeth, Lady Sedley, and residing in the same county, was another Sir John Sedley, whose wife was also named Elizabeth. He was a second cousin of the Sedleys of Aylesford and Southfleet, grandson of Nicholas Sedley, the youngest son of the first William Sedley, and son of Sir Isaac Sedley, Bart., of Great Chart. This Sir John had one eye, and was "a person of violent and malicious disposition," unlike his kinsman, the poet's father, who is said to have been a man of "better quality."³ The one-eyed Sir John belonged to the extreme wing of the Opposition to the Court during the reign of Charles I, and during the Civil War he was one of the leaders of the Kentish Roundheads. His property was at the village of Ightam St. Cleers, not many miles from his kinsman's, and, what is still more confusing, his second son, who ultimately became his heir, was called Charles. This Sir Charles Sedley of Ightam St. Cleers was the poet's third cousin and almost exact contemporary. When the poet's son, Charles, was knighted

¹ Cal. State Papers Dom., 1611-18, p. 69 (J. Chamberlain to Alice Carleton, 4 February 1613); State Papers, Jas. I, Vol. 72, p. 23.

² Ibid., p. 175 (same to same, 11 March). Also p. 122 (Sir H. Savile to Carleton).

³ Cal. State Papers Dom., 1636, p. 47. (Sir J. Rayney to Secy. Coke 2 July; same to Secy. Nicholas, 5 July.)

by William III, there were thus three Sir Charles Sedleys living at the same time, a fact that has never been clearly stated before and which has caused endless confusion to biographers and genealogists.¹

Sir John Sedley of Southfleet, father of the poet, like most of the Sedleys, was educated at Oxford, entering Magdalen in April 1609, graduating in ¹⁶⁰⁹⁻¹³ February 1611/12, and proceeding M.A. in July 1613,² the year of his marriage to Elizabeth Savile. He appears to have celebrated the taking of his degree in the ancient manner by a carouse. A learned treatise on the wines "drunk to Sr. Sedlye late Bachelor of Art in joy of his degree in learning," entitled "Health in a Cup of Wine," was written (but never published) by a certain Dr. Robert Hervie. It survives in MS.³ and is dedicated to Sir John's mother, Lady Abergavenny. It gives a curious description of "whyte wyne," "pale wine, 'twixt whyt and yellow," "yellow wyne," "mulsum," "hippocras," and other concoctions with which young men used to ruin their digestion in those days.

Sir John Sedley entered Lincoln's Inn on 9 June, 1610,⁴ but there is no evidence that he ever practised ¹⁶¹⁰⁻²² as a barrister.

In 1622, William Barret dedicated to him his edition of Underdown's translation of "Heliodorus His Aethiopian History,"⁵ and from the language used by the translator it appears that, as befitted a son-in-law of Sir Henry Savile, Sir John was a lover of literature and a patron of men of letters. His town house was in Shire Lane, the narrow and ancient thoroughfare which ran into Fleet Street just by

¹ LL.D., for instance, confuses the son of the poet with his third cousin.

² "Alumni Oxonienses" (Early Series), IV. 1332.

³ Now (1924) in the possession of Messrs. P. J. and A. E. Dobell.

⁴ "Lincoln's Inn Admission Register," I. 153.

⁵ See Bibliography, under Barret, William.

Temple Bar, and in the reign of Charles I, he and his wife formed part of a cultivated and aristocratic circle which included Sir Henry Savile, Viscount Dorchester,¹ Secretary of State and husband of Ann Savile, Lady Sedley's sister, and Sir Anthony Welldon, a somewhat eccentric person, who had been dismissed from Court by James I for some outspoken comments on the Scottish nation,² and who was now a bitter opponent of the Government.

Sir John and his wife had nine children, of whom five predeceased their father.³ The survivors were three sons, Henry, William and Charles (the last named being posthumous), and a daughter, Elizabeth. Sir John died at Mount Mascall, North Cray, Kent, not far from his ancestral property at Southfleet, 1638 on 13 August, 1638.⁴ On 5 October of the previous year, when his wife was already an expectant mother, he had made a will which is still extant.⁵ By it he left the bulk of his property to his wife, Sir Edward Hales, Sir Anthony Welldon, Anthony Croftes and Anthony Langston, in trust for his eldest son, Henry, to inherit on attaining the age of twenty-three. If he died childless, it was to revert to the second son, William, and, if he also died without issue, to the unborn child, if it should prove to be a son. In either case the heir was to attain the age of twenty-three before coming into his estate. If no son survived, the daughters, Elizabeth and Margaret (or whichever outlived the other), were to inherit the property on marriage, or ¹ D. N. B., s.a., Carleton, Dudley. For his intimacy with the Sedleys see Cal. State Papers. Dom. Jas. I.

² D. N. B., s.a., Welldon, Sir Anthony.

³ Two Johns died in 1625 and 1635, two Annas in 1627 and 1629, and Margaret in 1638 (Southfleet Burial Register). The elder John lived long enough to be admitted to Lincoln's Inn on 29 January, 1621/2 ("Lincoln's Inn Admission Register").

⁴ Cal. State Papers Dom., 1637/8, p. 598.

⁵ There is a copy in Somerset House, of which I possess a transcript; see also Haslewood's notes to Jacob, note (6), Appendix I.

on attaining the age of seventeen. There was also ¹⁶³⁸ generous provision for the younger children, in the event of the inheritance falling to Henry. Elizabeth was to have five thousand pounds, William twelve thousand, and Margaret and the unborn child two thousand five hundred each. Sir John's servants were to have board and lodging in his house for six months after his death, and a special provision was made for a Mr. Rabbet, who appears to have been the tutor of the young Sedleys, and who was also recommended to the heir. Finally, there were liberal bequests for educational institutions: four hundred pounds to be laid out in lands to maintain a schoolmaster at Wymondham in Leicestershire, which formed part of the Sedley estates, a like sum to provide a schoolmaster for Southfleet in Kent, five hundred pounds for the Postmasters of Merton, and another five hundred for the Demies of Magdalen College, Oxford. The whole will is in accordance with the best traditions of the Sedley family, and a pleasant human touch is added by a codicil which proves that Sir John was fond of hunting. It enjoins upon the heir to keep "ten couples of hounds att the least," and provides a rent charge of twenty pounds a year for their maintenance. In a second codicil, made only one day before the testator's death, Sir John endeavours to win for his widow and children the powerful support of Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, and of Mr. Secretary Windebanke, by bequeathing a hundred pounds' worth of plate to each, and another hundred pounds to the Archbishop for the rebuilding of St. Paul's. At a time when it seemed possible that Charles I might succeed in setting up an absolute monarchy, with Laud as one of his chief ministers, these bequests were probably the natural precautions of a far-seeing man, who had already appointed Anthony Welldon, a prominent figure in the Parliamentary party, as one of his executors. Events were to justify his actions, for, 1638 although the Archbishop and the Secretary were powerless to help Lady Sedley and her children, Sir Anthony was to prove a good friend to them when his party triumphed. No doubt the testator felt a very considerable responsibility, for the Sedley estates were extensive. At this time they probably included manors in several parts of Kent, Leicestershire, Oxfordshire and Cambridgeshire.¹ From the sums named in the will the rent roll must have been a very large one.

1639 No record exists of the exact date and place of the birth of Charles, the posthumous son and future poet. He was certainly baptised on 5 March in the year following his father's death at the ancient church of St. Clement Danes, which, before the Great Fire, stood on the site of Gibb's masterpiece in the Strand.² As St. Clement Danes stood at no great distance from Shire Lane, it seems highly probable that Charles Sedley was born in his father's house in that street some time in the month of March 1639.³

¹ Haslewood's Notes to Jacob, No. (2), Appendix I.

² Entry in St. Clement Danes Baptismal Register:—

1639

March Charles Sydley son of Sr John Sydley and lady Eliza bd. 30.

³ Anthony à Wood, followed by most biographers, says he was born "at or near Aylesford." Wheatley, on the other hand, in his "London Past and Present" (III. 240), asserts positively that he was born in the house in Shire Lane, and, in the absence of more definite evidence, the entry in St. Clement Danes register certainly supports his view.

CHAPTER II

THE SEDLEYS DURING THE CIVIL WAR AND UNDER THE COMMONWEALTH

"Here lyes the learned Savi's Heir,
So early wise, and lasting fair ;
That none, except her years they told,
Thought her a Child, or thought her old."

"Epitaph on the Lady Sidly," by Edmund
Waller, first published in the 6th edition of his Poems, 8vo, London, 1693; Part II (dated 1690), p. 43.

"Hail Sacred Wadham ! whom the Muses Grace
And from the Rest of all the Reverend Pile
Of Noble Pallaces, design'd thy Space :
Where they in soft retreat might dwell.
They blest thy Fabrick, and said—do thou
Our Darling Sons contain."

Mrs. Aphra Behn, "To Mr. Creech (under the name of Daphnis)," Poems upon Several Occasions, 1684, p. 53.

ELIZABETH, Lady Sedley, seems to have been a woman of high spirit, of considerable intellectual attainments, and of great personal charm. Her father probably named her after his great patron, the Virgin Queen, and his choice was appropriate, for she was one of the ladies who carried into the seventeenth century something of the dignity and aristocratic culture of the Elizabethan age. Her youth was passed when the glories of that age had scarcely waned, for our first record of her dates from the year 1613, when Shakespeare, Bacon and Raleigh were still alive. It is a few words in a letter from her father, Sir Henry Savile, to his son-in-law, Dudley Carleton, then English Envoy at Venice :

"A match for yor sister Besse wth Sr Wm Sidleys sonne wee the parēts have cōcluded."¹

Although the match was "concluded" by the parents and neither "Besse" nor John Sedley probably had much to say in the matter, there is every reason to suppose that its results were successful. Sir John seems to have been a man of a refined and dignified temperament, which must have been perfectly congenial to that of Elizabeth Savile. We know that he was a lover of books and of hunting, and so little of a politician that he had friends among the extremists of both parties, and we can imagine that the tranquil married life of these wealthy and cultivated people was clouded only by the death of many of their children in infancy.

¹⁶²⁹ Lady Sedley's one extant letter, dated from Aylesford, 21 June, 1629, is addressed to her brother-in-law, Dudley Carleton, now Viscount Dorchester, a trusted adviser of King Charles I, and shows that she was on intimate terms with that nobleman.² Sir Anthony Welldon, her husband's Roundhead friend, was also among her acquaintances, and an anecdote told by Anthony à Wood proves that she was highly respected by that republican baronet. According to Wood Sir Anthony wrote his very scurrilous "Court and Character of King James I" at the beginning of the Long Parliament, and showed the manuscript to Lady Sedley, who "did lay the vileness of it so much to his door" that he resolved never to publish it.³ From this story, as well as from the fact that she named her youngest son after the King, it would seem that Lady

¹ State Papers Dom., Jas. I, 72, p. 122.

² State Papers Dom., Chas. I, 45, p. 22. See Appendix I, pp. 305-6.

³ "Athenæ Oxonienses," ed. Bliss, II. 868. Sir Anthony's book was published after his death in London (12mo, 1651, reprinted 1811), and dedicated to The Lady Sedley(!). Sir W. Sanderson in the Preface of his "Compleat History of Mary Queen of Scotland," etc. (London, fol., 1656), says that the manuscript had been "intended by Sir A. W. for the fire," but since then it had "stoln to the Press out of a Ladies closet."

Sedley was one of those grave, cultivated, moderate royalists, like Falkland and Hyde, who were equally horrified by Wentworth's "Thorough" and the proceedings of Hampden and Pym. The "sad breaking of the Parliament" was a terrible blow for such persons, who had always hoped for a reconciliation, and who were now compelled to look on in helpless terror and sorrow, while the wilder spirits on both sides were dragging down into the dust all they cherished most in England. For Lady Sedley the public calamity coincided with a period of domestic sorrow. Her husband died two years before the meeting of the Long Parliament. On 17 April in the following year (1639), Archbishop Laud wrote to the President of St. John's College, Oxford, recommending Sir Henry Sedley, her eldest son, to his care, "that his mother may see that he is entertained with more than common respect."¹ Sir Henry was admitted to St. John's on 14 June, and died in the following month, three years after his father and in the midst of that fatal summer which followed Strafford's execution.² Sir Henry Savile's daughter was not, however, a woman to be cowed by misfortunes. On 8 June, 1642, only six weeks before the King set up his standard at Nottingham, in spite of her known royalist sympathies, she had the courage to appear at the Bar of the House of Commons and petition that exasperated and revolutionary assembly against one of their members, a certain Mr. John Griffith junior, who had insulted her.³ This John Griffith is described by Clarendon as "a young Welshman of no parts or reputation, but for eminent licence."⁴ He had sought "with great boldness" for preferment at Court, and, when rebuffed by the King and Queen, had joined the extreme section

¹ Laud's Works (Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology), VII. 558.

² "Alumni Oxonienses," Early Series, IV. 1332.

³ "Journals of the House of Commons," II. 613, 712; IV. 109, 162, 169.

⁴ "Hist. of Great Rebellion" (8vo, Oxford, 1705), I. 434.

1642 of the Parliamentary party. He probably attempted to show his zeal to his new friends by insulting an eminent royalist lady. It is to its credit that the House listened to Lady Sedley with respect and granted her "Liberty to prosecute against the said Mr. Jo. Griffiths, the younger, notwithstanding that he is a Member of this House." His person was ordered to be secured, and a Committee was appointed to inquire into the affair. On 10 August he was expelled from the House and proceedings were begun against him before the King's Bench. He escaped to the army, but his career would appear to have ended, after many other escapades, in Newgate prison in 1645.

Lady Sedley and her family seem to have left the house in Shire Lane about the time of the outbreak of the Civil War, and in the summer of 1643 she was living at the pleasant village of Highgate, then separated from London by many miles of open country.¹ The sturdiness of Charles Sedley's constitution, and, indeed, the very fact that he survived at all, may well be due to his having spent his early childhood in the pure air of Highgate.

During the Civil War the part of England which was in the power of the Parliament was administered by Committees of the two Houses. One of the most famous of these bodies was the Committee for Advance of Money, which usually sat at Haberdashers' Hall in Gresham Street, under the presidency of Lord Saye and Sele. Its business was to fill the coffers of the Parliamentary armies by means of what was actually a heavy property tax, although it was euphemistically called 1643 a loan or "advance of money." It was supposed to be levied on all estates impartially, but, in practice, it naturally fell more heavily upon those persons who were suspected of royalism. It must not, however, be confused with the sequestration or entire or partial¹⁶⁴³ confiscation of the estates of "delinquents," or proved royalists, which was the business of a special Committee. Eventually, when the Parliament obtained control of the whole of England, it was enacted that the "assessments" of the Committee for the Advance of Money were to be levied only on those who had failed to take the oaths to the new Government. As Lady Sedley had probably neither the means nor the desire to show any active sympathy for the royal cause, whatever her personal opinions may have been, she was at present spared from the necessity of "compounding" with the more Draconian of the Committees. She was subjected, however, to a good deal of annoyance from the Committee for Advance of Money, although, thanks to the timely help of Sir Anthony Welldon, she and Sir William escaped more lightly than many other landowners. On 8 August, 1643, a minute of the Committee informs us she had been "assessed" to pay what was then the very large sum of £1500. She had already "lent" £375, and was now called upon to pay the remainder.¹ Two days later the Committee ordered that she was to be "respited" pending inquiries.² At the beginning of October, as she had not yet satisfied the authorities, she was actually "attached" or arrested, and brought to London by warrant of the Committee of Examinations.³ While she was waiting to be examined, she was placed in the custody of the Messenger of the House of Commons. The domiciliary visit of the crop-headed Parliamentary soldiers, which probably preceded his mother's arrest, may well have been among Sedley's earliest memories, and perhaps, when he introduced such a visit many years later into his comedy "The Mulberry Garden," he was drawing

¹ In the first mention of Lady Sedley in the Accounts of the Committee for Advance of Money (State Papers Dom., Int. A. 61, f. 38) she is described as "Lady Sedley, Highgate." The date is 8 August, 1643.

¹ State Papers Dom., Int. A. 61, f. 38.

² Ibid., Int. A. 75, f. 44.

³ Ibid., Int. A. 2, f. 106. (Cal. of Proceedings of Committee for Advance of Money, I. 207.)

1643 upon recollections of his own childhood. How long Lady Sedley remained a prisoner is not recorded, but by 9 October Sir Anthony Welldon had come to her rescue, and, on his undertaking that "the Lady shall appear on ffriday next," she was released. She appeared on the 16th,¹ but the Committee was not 1645 sitting. On the 17th she was brought before them and ordered to pay £375 by Thursday, the 26th of the month, whereupon she was to be allowed to "make oath" as to her proportion:² that is, to state on oath the value of the twentieth part of her estate, which, according to the ordinance, was to be levied by the Committee. On 1 November,³ having paid the £375, she swore before the Committee that this represented "her full twentieth, that is for the estate both reall and personall." Her original contribution of £375 was thereupon repaid to her, and henceforward she was not troubled very much concerning her own estate, which, if her figure was correct, must have been worth about £7500. As trustee for her husband, and mother of Sir William Sedley, the second surviving son, who had now succeeded to the baronetcy, she had still a good deal to endure at the hands of the Committees.

On 3 July, 1645, Sir Anthony Welldon wrote a letter to the Committee for Advance of Money on behalf of Lady Sedley and her son.⁴ The letter is dated from Aylesford, and it is possible that the Sedleys and Sir Anthony were all staying on the family estate in that village. Sir Anthony says that Lady Sedley assured him that neither she nor Sir William had inhabited London "or within 20 myles" since she acquitted herself by oath at Haberdashers' Hall (on 1 November, 1643). Apparently the Committee had made some demand upon the Sedleys, on the ground

¹ State Papers Dom., Int. A. 2, f. 114.

² Ibid., f. 117.

³ Ibid.

⁴ Ibid., A. 90, f. 110. See Appendix I. pp. 306-7.

that they were occupying a house in London. This ¹⁶⁴⁵ house, which was probably the house in Shire Lane, had, according to Lady Sedley, been "a long time tennanted" (i.e. let to a tenant), and so she conceived herself "in noe weye concernd" with the demand of the Committee. Sir Anthony also paints a gloomy picture of the estate probably with the object of softening the hearts of the Committee towards his ward. "A plentifull fortune" had been swallowed up "in necessary payments," and Lady Sedley was "ingulphed in the usurer's books."¹ On 11 July, Sir William Sedley's case was discussed by the Committee. He appears to have been "assessed" at £1000, but in view of the facts that the "greatest part of the estate" was "under the power of the King's army," and that his guardian had paid £160 to the Court of Wards for what was under the power of the Parliament, the assessment was discharged, and it was ordered that neither Sir William nor his guardian were to be troubled any further.² The part of the estates "under the power of the King's army" in 1645 must have been the Leicestershire and Oxfordshire Manors, and perhaps some title-deeds or other securities, which were in the hands of the other executors, who may have been adherents of the King. The Kentish lands were certainly in the power of the Parliament, and would be protected by Sir John Sedley of Ightam St. Cleers, now a Colonel in the Parliamentary army, who, with Sir Anthony Welldon, is said to have "ruled all Kent" during the Civil War.³ On 29 August the Committee for Sequestration of Estates, the body which dealt with the property of "malignants," or royalists, received a petition from Lady Sedley, in her quality of executrix of Sir John Sedley, and Sir William, her son. The

¹ State Papers Dom., Int. A. 90, f. 110.

² Ibid., Int. A. 4, f. 199.

³ "Archæologia Cantiana," II. 196, III. 197. See also "Acts and Ordinances of the Interregnum," I. passim.

1645 petition is not preserved, but it may be supposed that it was a complaint against agents of the Committee who had forcibly occupied some of the Sedley property. It was referred to Mr. Bradshaw, later to attain celebrity by becoming president of the court that tried Charles I. His report upon it seems to have been favourable, and, on 19 September, it was ordered that either the "just debt and damadges" should be paid to the petitioners, or else they were to be permitted "to enjoy" a certain Mortgage.¹

Before the Committee came to this decision the Sedleys had left England. On 6 September, 1645, Sir William had received permission from the House of Commons to go "to France or other parts for his health and education," with his mother, a tutor (probably Mr. Rabbet), two men-servants, and three maid-servants to attend Lady Sedley.² In the entry in the Journals of the House which records the granting of this permission, no mention is made of Charles, but it is not improbable that he may have accompanied his mother.

If he spent two years in France at this age, it cannot be supposed that he received anything more than a very fleeting impression. However, he may well have laid the foundations of the knowledge of the French language which he certainly possessed in later years. The permission to travel granted to the Sedleys was revoked by an order to return by the 1647/48-
49 10th April, 1647/8, recorded in the Journals of the House of Commons under the date of 7 February.³

They were prudent enough to obey the order of the Parliament. If they had failed to do so, their estates would certainly have suffered. As it was, Sir William was again summoned before the Committee for Advance of Money on 26 December, 1649, when he is described as living "at Temple Bar," which may ^{1647/51} mean that he was occupying his father's old house in Shire Lane.¹ He was "assessed" at £1000, but discharged on 2 June, 1649.² The Committee sent for him again on 2 January, 1650,³ and he then proved to their satisfaction that he was "no delinquent" (i.e. that he had taken the oaths to the Commonwealth), and, as it had been decreed that the "assessments" were to be levied only on "delinquents," he was finally "discharged from attendance" on the Committee. After this it is possible to understand why John Tatham in his dedication of his tragedy, "The Distracted State,"⁴ "To the truly Noble Sir William Sidley, Baronet," says that Sir William had "equally balanced his actions in these distempered times." This must be a way of congratulating him on having been astute enough to win the favour of the new Government without alienating his old friends among the Cavaliers. This dedication, it may be remarked, is the only sign of Sir William's having taken any interest in literature. As early as 1647 he had apparently been regarded as a supporter of the Commonwealth, for on 3 March he was called upon to "seize and dispose" of the goods of Sir George Strode, a Kentish Cavalier. Lady Sedley, however, was regarded as a royalist as late as 1651. On 15 October in that year, some of her property in Lincolnshire was seized by the Parliamentary Commissioners, and she never seems to have obtained redress.

¹ State Papers Dom., Int. B. 1, ff. 978, 1000.

² Journals of House of Commons, IV. 264.

³ Ibid., V. 457.

¹ State Papers Dom., Int. A. 28, f. 17.

² Ibid., Int. A. 71, f. 96.

³ Ibid., Int. A. 8, f. 96.

⁴ 4to, London, 1651, said on the title-page to have been written in 1641. In the British Museum copy the dedication is headed "To the truly Noble Sir John Sedley." In the Bodleian copy the dedication is to Sir William. Perhaps the dedication to "Sir John" was a mere printer's error, corrected in later copies. The editors of Tatham's Plays in the "Dramatists of the Restoration" Series (Edinburgh, 1878) state incorrectly in their introduction to the "Distracted State" that the play is dedicated to "Sir Charles Sedley's grandfather," who had been dead for many years.

c. 1650 From such records of his mother and family we can form some idea of Charles Sedley's childhood. It was passed in an age of strife and confusion, when traditional ideas and beliefs were crumbling away, and new theories were rapidly springing up and being applied with fiery haste. Clarendon comments bitterly on the kind of upbringing which even children of noble families received at this time: "All relations," he writes, "were confounded by the several sects in religion, which discountenanced all forms of reverence and respect, as relics and marks of superstition. Children asked not the blessing of their parents; nor did they concern themselves in the education of their children; but were well content that they should take any course to maintain themselves, that they might be free from that expense."¹ At that time the education of a fatherless boy, even though he belonged to a rich family, must have been peculiarly undisciplined and chaotic. "Parents," writes Clarendon, "had no authority over their children nor children any obedience or submission to their parents; but 'everyone did that which was good in his own eyes'."² The frequent changes of residence, the absence of Lady Sedley, while defending her own and her children's interests before the Committees and elsewhere, and, finally, the exciting continental journey, would all help to encourage idleness and pleasure-seeking, and also, in a gifted boy, to stimulate intellectual curiosity. The studies of the future poet were doubtless superintended by his mother ("the learned Savil's heir"), who, if we can believe Waller, was herself a poetess,³ and by Mr. Rabbet, if that

¹ "The Life of Edward, Earl of Clarendon, etc." Oxford, 1857, I, 305.

² Ibid.

³

"The mûses daily found supplies
Both from her hands and from her eyes."

(Waller's "Epitaph on the Lady Sidly.") This couplet may, however, refer to music.

gentleman still continued to teach the young Sedleys. c. 1650
 Charles is said to have received "a proper foundation of grammar learning,"¹ which, in the seventeenth century, meant a very thorough grounding in Latin and perhaps some French and Greek. The cultivated and refined atmosphere in which he was brought up must, however, have had a more important influence than any formal lessons. In such a family as the Lady Sedley's there must have been much more of the love of beautiful and gracious things which is usually associated with the civilisation of the Renaissance than in most households of the seventeenth century. The tradition of the flighty great-uncle, John, and his Italian wanderings must have survived. Among Sir Charles Sedley's books was the 1559 edition of Baldassare Castiglione's "Il Cortegiano," the favourite guide of the Renaissance courtier, which may well have been brought by John Sedley from Italy. Certainly the memory of those learned friends, Sir Henry Savile and Sir William Sedley, must have counted for a great deal. It was probably from desultory readings in their great folios that Charles Sedley acquired that knowledge and love of the Latin poets that was to colour most of his writings. Moreover, there is evidence that Lady Sedley was visited by at least one distinguished living writer under the Protectorate. Edmund Waller, in his fine "Epitaph on the Lady Sidly" (first printed in 1690), wrote lines that prove that both he and other Cavaliers were among her friends at this time :

"Such was this Dame in calmer days,
 Her Nation's ornament and praise.
 But when a Storm disturbed our Rest,
 The Port and Refuge of th' oppress.
 This made her fortune understood,
 And look'd on as some public good,

¹ The phrase is first used in the article on Sedley in "Biographia Britannica" (1747-66).

c. 1650

So that, her Person and her State
Exempted from the common Fate,
In all our civil fury she Stood, like a Sacred Temple, free."¹

From these verses it may be inferred that Lady Sedley made use of such influence as she possessed with the Parliamentary leaders to mitigate the sufferings of distressed Cavaliers. Also, they leave little room for doubt that Waller and other cultivated royalists often met under her roof. Their rich dresses and courtly conversation must have had a great effect on an intelligent boy. From them he would hear something of the great days of Ben Jonson and his tribe, and more of Sir John Suckling, that paragon of court poets. The Sedley household may thus be pictured as a little oasis of culture in the gloom of Puritan England. The contrast between such surroundings and the drabness of the exterior world under a Government that cut down maypoles, punished actors, and fined Sabbath-day tipplers, must have struck boys like William and Charles Sedley no less than the differences between certain of their mothers' friends—for example, the cantankerous old precisian, Sir Anthony Welldon, and the graceful and polished Waller. Such impressions found an echo years later in the characters of Sir John Everyyoung and Sir Samuel Forecast in "The Mulberry Garden."

c. 1652–
55

In the latter years of the Protectorate there was a general and very natural inclination among young men of good birth and liberal education to break through the restraints of the kill-joy Puritan Government, and indulge in the traditional pleasures of English gentlemen. The Lord Protector was known to be by no means so severe a censor as some of his associates.

¹ "Epitaph on the Lady Sidly," by Edmund Waller (6th edition of Waller's Poems, London, 8vo, 1693; Part II. (dated 1690), p. 43). Poems, ed. Thorn Drury, II. 115.

He was said to pardon conspirators, if they happened c. 1652- to be poets, to love music and fine horses, and to 55 connive at private dramatic performances. Sir William Sedley was one of the young people who began to attempt something like a revival of the gay society of the days of Sir John Suckling. According to Anthony à Wood he lived "very high" in London in the time of Oliver with his friend, Mr. Robert Dormer of Oxfordshire.¹ To "live very high" under the Commonwealth was to frequent taverns, cock-fightings, and illicit dramatic performances at the Cock-pit at Drury Lane, or the Red Bull in St. John's Street.² Wood writes that Sir William and his friend "did strive who should outvie each other in gallantry, and in splendid coaches." The last detail is significant. Cromwell had a very English weakness for fine horses and carriages, and it was natural that young men who were attempting to revive the gallantries of court life should have chosen this way of amusing themselves, as that which would least offend the Government. The "splendid coaches" in which Sir William Sedley and Mr. Dormer drove "in the field near the Town which they call Hide Park,"³ were huge, clumsy Noah's Arks on wheels, immensely wide, with unglazed windows. Sir William Davenant must have been thinking of such young sparks as these when he urged on the authorities the necessity of "divertissements," "not only to recreate those who will too much apprehend the absence of the adverse party, but alsoe to entertaine a new generation of youth uningaged in the late differences, of which there is a numerous growth since the

¹ "Athenæ Oxonienses" (Bliss), I. lxii; "Life and Times," ed. Clarke, II. 147.

² All these amusements were popular under the Commonwealth, in spite of the ordinances against them. See "Middlesex County Records," III. pp. 247, 248, 282.

³ "A Character of England" (by John Evelyn, London, 1659, 12mo), p. 54.

c. 1652- warre, who should be withdrawne from licentiousnesse, 55 gaming and discontent."¹

1654/55 Sir William married Lady Chandos, widow of John, Lord Chandos, who died in February 1654/5.² This Lady Chandos was the eldest daughter of John Savage, Earl Rivers, a friend of Richard Sackville, fifth Earl of Dorset. Earl Rivers had died, ruined by his stubborn resistance to the Parliament, in 1654.³ He left a widow and eight children, of whom the eldest, John, succeeded to the title. The marriage of Jane, the eldest daughter, widow of Lord Chandos, to Sir William Sedley took place at St. Mildred's, Poultry, on 9 October,⁴ 1655. It must have been conducted before a civil magistrate, according to the law of 1652. Charles Sedley, now a lad of sixteen, was, doubtless, present at the ceremony. After his marriage, in accordance with the prudent custom of his family, Sir William made provision for the unborn children, of whom he apparently expected to be father, by means of a deed, limiting his estate to his first and other sons.⁵

1655/56 Meanwhile, Charles, like most of his ancestors, entered the University of Oxford, where he was admitted a fellow-commoner of Wadham College on 22 March, 1655/6.⁶ Wadham was one of the most fashionable colleges in that regenerate Oxford of the Protectorate, which was admitted, even by Clarendon, to have "yielded a harvest of extraordinary good and sound knowledge in all parts of learning." Its Warden was the famous Dr. Wilkins, the husband of Crom-

¹ "Some Observations concerning the People of this Nation," printed from Davenant's MS. by Sir C. H. Firth in the Historical Review, Vol. XVIII. p. 319. The italics are mine.

² G. E. C., "Complete Peerage," ed. Vicary Gibbs, 1916, III. 128.

³ "The Ancient and Noble Family of the Savages of the Ards," compiled by G. F. A(rmstrong). (London, 4to, 1888), p. 50.

⁴ St. Mildred Poultry Marriage Register.

⁵ See Haslewood's "Notes to Jacob," Appendix I. p. 322.

⁶ Gardiner's "Registers of Wadham College," I. 213.

well's sister, who had done, perhaps, more than any single man to renew the intellectual life of the University after the Civil War. He was especially noted as a leader of the new school of experimental and rationalist thinkers, which claimed to be carrying out the scientific programme of Bacon. At his Lodge at Wadham were held some of the first meetings of the philosophical club that afterwards developed into the Royal Society.¹ These scientific enthusiasts or "virtuosi," as they were sometimes called, were inclined to discourage mysticism and religious "enthusiasm," and to exalt the power of human reason and profane learning. They were the intellectual forerunners of the latitudinarians of the Restoration and the eighteenth century. It is very significant that several of the wits of the Restoration Court were educated at Wadham,² which was the head-quarters of the Oxford "virtuosi" under the Protectorate. The excesses of these young men in the reign of Charles II may be regarded as a sort of distorted application of the experimental view of life taught by such men as Wilkins.

The Warden is said to have been a "lustie . . . broad-shoulder'd person, cheerful and hospitable,"³ and among his undergraduates, in 1655,⁴ besides Charles Sedley, was John Lovelace, afterwards Lord Lovelace, famous later for licentiousness and Whiggism. Nevertheless, good discipline was maintained in Wadham under the rule of Wilkins. Undergraduates had to speak Latin within College walls, while tutors exercised control over their pupils' finances, receiving

¹ He was the principal reviver of experimental philosophy at Oxford (secundum mentem domini Baconi), where he had weekly an experimental philosophical club "which . . . was the incunabula of the Royal Society." Aubrey (on Wilkins), "Brief Lives," ed. Clark, II. 301.

² Sedley (1655/6), Rochester (1659/60), Car Scroop (1664). Gardiner, Reg. Wadham. Coll., Vol. I.

³ Aubrey, ed. Clark, "Brief Lives," II. 301.

⁴ He came up on 25 July, 1655 (Gardiner's "Registers of Wadham College," I. 209).

1655/56 and regulating their allowances.¹ Sedley's tutor, according to the College Register, was "Mr. Pope," afterwards Dr. Walter Pope, half-brother to the Warden, and, like him, a prominent "virtuoso." This Dr. Pope is ever memorable in literary history as the author of that famous ballad beginning:

"If I live to be old, for I find I goe down,
Let this be my fate, in a Country town;
May I have a warm House with a Stone at the gate,
And a cleanly young girl, to rub my bald Pate."²

He was a man possessed of wide and curious learning and of a strong sense of humour, although, according to Anthony à Wood, he "lived a heathenish and epicurean life."³ Sedley probably enjoyed his company and spent many pleasant hours listening to his "puns, proverbs and senseless digressions"⁴ in the beautiful gardens of Wadham, which at that time had been recently laid out. After a period of confusion that followed the Civil War, the life of the University had been notably renewed under the Protectorate. Oliver Cromwell had been elected Chancellor in 1650 and his able friend and chaplain, John Owen, became Dean of Christ Church and Vice-Chancellor. There was a marked improvement in discipline, but, except on the religious side, the teaching remained very much what it was after Laud's great re-organisation. One reform may be noticed as especially affecting students of the type of Sedley: "Gentlemen Commoners were required to do exercises like others 'to the intent that noe person may live idly in this University, and that Gentlemen may answere the expectation of their friends.'" ⁵ Like all first-year men, besides reading

¹ Cf. Wells's "History of Wadham College," p. 67.

² "The Old Man's Wish." Broadside, ?1685. See Bibliography under Pope, Walter.

³ "Athenæ Oxonienses," IV. 724 (ed. Bliss).

⁴ The phrase is from Thomas Wood's "An Appendix to the Life of Seth Ward in a Letter to the Author" (8vo, 1697).

⁵ Mallet's History of the University of Oxford, II. 391.

and writing exercises for his tutor, Sedley would have 1655/56 to attend at least four lectures a week: two by the Praelector in Grammar and two by the Praelector in Rhetoric, all delivered in Latin at eight o'clock in the morning and all lasting at least three-quarters of an hour. He might also have attended the lectures on Natural Philosophy founded by his grandfather Sir William Sedley. Still more uncongenial for a young man of Sedley's stamp would be the compulsory attendance at sermons on Sundays (when notes had to be taken) and catechism in Hall on Saturday afternoons. There was, however, a lighter side to Puritan Oxford. We hear from Anthony à Wood that there was a great deal of music and entertaining in college rooms when "tarts, custards, chees cakes or any other junkets"¹ were largely consumed. Although the taverns were in disfavour, coffee-houses were springing up and Arthur Tillyard had opened one by All Souls in March 1655/6. It may have been at one of the new coffee-houses that Sedley met the shy, eccentric scholar Anthony à Wood, who claims "some acquaintance"² with him and his friend John Aubrey, who was struck by Sedley's likeness to his distinguished godfather, Sir Henry Savile, though he thought him not "so proper a man."³

Charles Sedley had only been at Oxford a few weeks when his brother, Sir William, died of an attack of measles. His funeral was "carried" from London to the family vault at Southfleet on 18 April, 1655/6.⁴ Thus the last bar between Charles and the title and estates was removed, and, at an age when a young man of spirit and intelligence naturally craves for pleasure and excitement, he was suddenly placed in a position to amuse himself beyond his wildest hopes. When his

¹ Anthony à Wood, "Life," I. 298.

² Ibid., I. 477.

³ "Aubrey's Brief Lives," ed. Clark, II. 215.

⁴ Smyth's "Obituary," ed. Camden Society, p. 42.

wild doings after the Restoration are recorded in a later chapter, this fact should be kept in mind.

1656 At the end of May 1656, Sir Charles Sedley was "sick of a feaver and the meazills of which Sir William died."¹ This illness was the first of several serious maladies from which he suffered at different periods of his life. That he survived both the diseases and the remedies of contemporary physicians shows that he had an exceptionally robust constitution.

Although he took no degree, it may be supposed that he was at Oxford for about a year. On his departure he presented his college with a silver castor and a mustard pot both of which are still among the college plate.² When he returned to London, he must have assumed the place that his brother had held in the fashionable society of the period. This society seems to have grown more and more licentious in the latter years of the Protectorate, and consisted largely of "mad drinking lords" who used to "sweare, game, and commit all the extravagances that are insident to untamed youths."³ Among the leaders of the rakes of the town were Philip Stanhope, second Earl of Chesterfield, and his mistress, Barbara Villiers, a dazzling beauty, afterwards to be the most voluptuous and profligate courtesan of the Restoration. Sedley was well acquainted with Chesterfield at a later date, and it is likely that their intimacy began under the Protectorate.

It was natural that, after Sir William's death, his heir should see a good deal of his brother's widow and her two sisters, Katherine and Mary Savage,⁴ who were probably flighty young girls in 1656. Perhaps it is

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., 5th Report, Appendix, Pt. I. 152. (A. Newport to Sir W. Leveson.)

² I have been allowed to see them by the kindness of the present Warden.

³ Cf. Letter of Lady Essex to the Second Earl of Chesterfield, printed in his Correspondence (London, 1829), p. 97.

⁴ "The Ancient and Noble Family of the Savages of the Ards," p. 53.

not too fanciful to find an idealised portrait of them in 1656 those two charming madcaps, Sir John Everyyoung's daughters, in Sedley's comedy "The Mulberry Garden," which, as its scene is laid at the end of the Protectorate, may be supposed to embody recollections of these years. The manners of young ladies partook of the general social confusion. Clarendon notes with horror that they "conversed without any circumspection or modesty, and frequently met at taverns or common eating houses."¹ It needs no great stretch of imagination to picture Katherine and Mary Savage, like Olivia and Victoria in the play, repairing unescorted and masked² to the Mulberry Garden, which stood on part of the site now covered by Buckingham Palace, and which, according to Evelyn, was "the onely place of entertainment about the town for persons of the first quality to be cheated at," after Cromwell's soldiers had shut up Spring Gardens.³ There the ladies would meet their "servants," who would entertain them with "certain trifling Tarts, Neate's-tongues, Salacious meates, and bad Rhenish,"⁴ and make love to them in stilted language borrowed from the high-flown French romances which were then the latest novelty in fiction.⁵ Amid such surroundings it was very natural that a match should be concluded between Sir Charles Sedley and one of the sisters of his brother's widow. As both the baronet and Katherine Savage were under twenty, it may be safely assumed their courtship was rather in the nature of a boy and girl flirtation against the pretty background of Park and Mulberry Garden than the result

¹ Clarendon, "Life," ed. 1857, I. 305.

² Like Dorothy Osborne in Spring Gardens in June 1654. See her letter to Sir W. Temple, 6 June, 1654 (ed. Parry, Everyman's Library p. 243).

³ Evelyn's Diary (ed. Dobson), II. 71, s.d. 10 May, 1654.

⁴ "A Character of England," 1659, p. 57.

⁵ Sedley's library probably included the "Grand Cyrus" in the English translation of 1655, see p. 388.

1656 of any serious passion. Their intimacy was, doubtless, encouraged both by Lady Sedley (if she was still alive¹) and the Savages, who had been ruined by the Civil War, and who must have been glad enough to marry a scantily portioned younger daughter to one of the richest baronets in Kent. The wedding took place at the church of St. Giles-in-the-Fields on 9 February, 1656/57 1656/7,² and, like that of Sir William, it must have been conducted before a civil magistrate. The newly married couple seem to have gone to live in Great Queen Street,³ then a very fashionable thoroughfare running from Drury Lane to Lincoln's Inn Fields. Their house was possibly one of the fine row, built 1657 there by Inigo Jones in the reign of Charles I, which included the residence of Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and also that of Earl Rivers, Lady Sedley's brother.⁴ On 21 December, 1657, about ten months after the wedding, Lady Sedley gave birth to a daughter, who, at St. Giles's Church, eight days later, was baptised by the name of Katherine.

In the following spring the Sedleys were staying on their estates in Kent, and were being watched with some vigilance by the Government. Sir Charles may have already betrayed some sympathy with the royal cause, and his marriage into a Cavalier and Roman Catholic family would be quite enough to cast suspicion

¹ I have been unable to find any record of the date of her death. Waller's epitaph on her was only published in the sixth edition of his Works (1693), and it is quite possible that she survived the Restoration by many years.

² St. Giles-in-the-Fields Marriage Register. Gentleman's Magazine, October 1850 (p. 366).

³ I infer this from the letter (quoted below) from Wm. Persall to Sir W. Paston (Hist. MSS. Comm., 7th Rep., Appendix, p. 531), which gives details of Sir Charles Sedley among "our Queen Street news."

⁴ Lord Herbert of Cherbury died there in 1648 (Aubrey's "Lives," ed. Clark, II. 387). Earl Rivers mentions Rivers House, his residence in Great Queen Street, in his will (Wheatley's "London Past and Present," II. 137).

on him. The fact that on 26 March, 1657/8, he had to ^{1657/58} obtain permission from the Protector's Council to leave his house in Kent to attend some legal proceedings at Maidstone shows that he was not regarded very favourably by the authorities.¹

By May they had returned to London. On the 16th of that month the baronet and his lady were driving—perhaps in one of the coaches so dear to Sir William—through the parish of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. They were probably returning from the fashionable "tour" of Hyde Park, and were accompanied by another coach, containing a person who was possibly identical with one of the most prodigious coxcombs of the reign of Charles II. Both coaches were stopped by an official called the "Overseer of the Poor" of the parish, who fined the single gentleman ten shillings, and the married couple twenty-five shillings, for the heinous offence of "using of their coaches on the Sabbath day at an unlawfull time,"² that is, during church hours. Why five shillings should have been added to the joint fine of the married couple it is difficult to imagine. That one of the offenders was a woman may have added to the sin in Puritan eyes—or perhaps the Sedleys were hardened enough to laugh at the guardians of the Sabbath's purity. Some light on the motives of these guardians is thrown by a passage in a comedy, written some years later, where a Puritan constable sighs after the lucrative office of fining wealthy Sabbath-breakers:—"Would I were an Overseer of the Poor . . . there were

¹ State Papers Dom., Int. I. 78, f. 553.

² Accounts of the Overseers of the Poor of the Parish of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields (MS. preserved in the City Hall, Westminster). Wheatley's "London Past and Present" (II. 181) states incorrectly that Sir Charles was fined "several times" for this offence. The entry quoted above is the only one referring to him in the Accounts. The single gentleman is called "Sir John Hewitt" in the entry. I strongly suspect that this is a slip for Sir George Hewitt, the notorious coxcomb and supposed original of Sir Fopling Flutter.

1657/58 somewhat to be got by that.”¹ The scene between the gay young people of fashion and the kill-joy Puritan officials was typical of the age. It represents the half-absurd, half-pathetic, and wholly ineffective protest of the Saints against a generation which preferred the Park and the Mulberry Garden to the Kingdom of Heaven. The tables were soon to be turned, and, in the meantime, youth could afford to laugh and play.

The household in Great Queen Street seems to have been equipped on a pretty lavish scale. It certainly 1658 included a number of men-servants, for at the end of September 1658, the month of Cromwell’s death, we hear that two of Sir Charles Sedley’s footmen had died “of the new disease.”² From the same source we learn that among his neighbours in Great Queen Street was Lady Anne Brudenell (afterwards Countess of Shrewsbury), the dark-eyed beauty whose depravity was to cause one of the most tragic events of the reign of Charles II.

1659-60 Only a single clue to Sir Charles’ movements in the last troubled months of the Commonwealth has survived. At this time prudent royalists were content to keep quiet, while different sections of the “fanaticks” weakened themselves by their dissensions, and paved the way for a peaceful Restoration. When Monk reached London in January 1659/60, one of the first acts of the Provisional Government, which was formed pending the election of a “free parliament,” was, with the help of the loyal nobility and gentry, to reconstitute the Militia as a protection against the army, which was still a formidable menace to the nation. Sir Charles Sedley was one of the Commissioners appointed on 7 March, 1659,³ to raise this force in the counties of Kent and Leicester. In spite of the fact 1660 that there might have been very grim work before them,

¹ John Wilson’s “The Cheats” (4to, London, 1664), V. ii. p. 65.

² Hist. MSS. Comm., 7th Report, Appendix, p. 531. (Wm. Persall to Sir Wm. Paston, 24 September, 1658.)

³ “Acts and Ordinances of the Interregnum,” ed. Firth, II. 1433, 4.

these rustic battalions seem to have been enrolled in a 1660 holiday spirit. We are told that the "captains and other officers" were specially active in providing "very rich attire"¹ for themselves and their troops, who consisted chiefly of their tenants and farm labourers. It was the final emancipation from the Puritan gloom.

The Kentish contingent was under the command of the old Cavalier general, George Goring, Earl of Norwich, and, as one of the officers of this body, it is almost certain that Sir Charles was present at the actual landing of the monarch to whom he was to prove so congenial a companion. We may picture him setting out from Canterbury with his gaily dressed followers in the train of General Monk on the morning of 25 May, 1660, when news had been brought that the royal flotilla was in sight. At "two of the clock in the afternoon" they reached Dover, and at three that fine old ship, formerly Naseby, now King Charles, was close to the pier. Two boats put off, one containing Mr. Samuel Pepys and one of the King's favourite dogs, and the other the swarthy, black-eyed Charles II with his two brothers, the Dukes of York and Gloucester. A canopy was held over the King's head as he landed, and Monk and thousands of spectators on the beach and cliffs fell on their knees. After Charles had raised and embraced the "Lord General," he walked towards his coach. On his way he was met by Mr. Reading, the Minister of Dover, who had come with the Mayor to welcome him. The divine made a short speech and presented the King with "a large bible wth gold clasps." It would be interesting to know if Sir Charles Sedley was close enough to see the twinkle in the royal eye as his Majesty thanked Mr. Reading, and gravely assured him "it was the thing he loved above all things in the world."² Soon the procession started on the road

¹ Rugge's "Diurnall" (Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 10116, f. 95).

² Pepys, ed. Wheatley, I. 162. Rugge's "Diurnall," f. 98. According to Pepys it was the Mayor who gave the Bible.

1660 to Canterbury, where the Recorder presented the restored monarch with a golden tankard, a far more appropriate gift than the Mayor of Dover's Bible. When the King had passed two nights in the Archbishop's Palace, the cavalcade set out for London, along roads lined with booths and gay with streamers. After inspecting the Puritan army, drawn up to give him a sullen welcome on Blackheath, the King and his train reached the outskirts of the capital, where "the maids in their ornaments came to meet them, making a gallant shoue." At St. George's Fields was the formal reception by the Lord Mayor, and from there, along streets hung with rich tapestry and crowded with spectators, the royal procession passed on to the ancient Palace of Whitehall. One of the gaily-dressed battalions that marched down the Strand consisted of the gentlemen of Kent, dressed in "white doublets," and among them, we may be sure, was Sir Charles Sedley of Southfleet, along with the representatives of other loyal and ancient families of the county.

CHAPTER III

THE WITS AND THEIR FROLICS

"... lived mostly in the great city, became a debauchee, set up for a satirical wit, a comedian, poet, and courtier of ladies and I know not what."—Anthony à Wood: "Life of Sir Charles Sedley," Athenæ Oxonienses.

"That notorious business in the balcony . . . scelus inauditum."—Anthony à Wood ("Life and Times," ed. Clarke, I. 476).

"Des Garnements comme Sidley."¹—"Mémoires de Grammont," Chap X.

"Mark the friendship of the dissolute!"—Dr. Johnson (on Sedley in his Life of Dorset: "Lives of the Poets," ed. Hill, I. 303).

"He appeared in Publick much about the Year 1663."—"Some Account of the Life of Sir Charles Sedley," prefixed to the edition of 1722.

SIR THOMAS URQUHART is said to have died of 1660 laughing when he heard of the Restoration. There is certainly a grim kind of humour in the way in which the exiled king was brought back to the throne of his ancestors. The large and influential body of Englishmen that actually accomplished the change was composed of elements which had nothing in common except the desire to restore the traditional political system. In every other respect their aims were ludicrously dissimilar. The Presbyterians thought that they could compel Charles II (of all people) to set up, if not the Kirk, at any rate a godly and sober administration and court. The old-fashioned royalists such as Hyde, Ormonde and Southampton wanted a complete reversion to the aristocratic and episcopal government

¹ Reading of MSS. in Bibliothèque Nationale and Bibliothèque Mazarine. Printed ed. read Sidney; see Ruth Clark's "Anthony Hamilton" (1921), p. 308.

1660 of the early seventeenth century with a revival of the stately ceremonial life of the old court. The third important section of the king's supporters were those whom Clarendon describes as "young men, who had never seen the king, and had been born and bred in those corrupt times 'when there was no king in Israel.'"¹ These young men, of whom Sir Charles Sedley was certainly one, belonged to the kind of generation which often follows a great war. Utterly disgusted with the endless discussion of questions of principle and conscience, they had reverted to a purely pagan attitude, and proclaimed that intellectual and sensuous pleasures were the only aims of a sensible man:

Let us indulge the Joys we know
Of Musick, Wine and Love.
We're sure of what we find below,
Uncertain what's above.

This hardness shocked old-fashioned observers like Clarendon, who writes that among them "the tenderness of the bowels, which is the quintessence of justice and compassion, the very mention of good nature was laughed at and looked upon as the mark and character of a fool; and a roughness of manners, or hardheartedness and cruelty, was affected."² These were the young men who were "uningaged in the late differences" and who "lived high under Oliver," and it was among them, and not among the sober Presbyterians or the grave old-fashioned royalists, that the restored king found his most intimate and sympathetic friends. Charles II with his artistic and pleasure-loving nature and his complete lack of a moral sense must indeed have appeared to them the very incarnation of their own spirit and many an old soldier who had poured out blood and treasure for the Stuarts must have slunk away in disgust at the sight of the son of the Royal Martyr surrounded by—

¹ Clarendon, "Life," etc., ed. 1857, I. 307.

² Clarendon, "Life," I. 307.

“those Whose Chins are beardless, yet their Hose
 And Buttocks still wear muffs;
 While the old rusty cavaleer Retires, or dares not once appear
 For want of Coin and Cuffs.”¹

1660

We have only two definite pieces of information about Sir Charles Sedley in the first years after the Restoration. One is a tradition that Harefield House, Middlesex, was burned down “by the carelessness of the witty Sir Charles Sedley, who was amusing himself by reading in bed” “about the year 1660.”² Harefield House was the property of Lady Chandos, the widow of Sir William Sedley and sister of Sir Charles’s wife, and it was there that Milton’s “Arcades” was acted by the Countess of Derby’s children about 1653. The Sedleys probably paid a visit to Lady Chandos soon after the Restoration, when the accident occurred.

In July 1661, Sedley was seriously ill³ and his 1661 death was considered imminent. However, as on more than one other occasion, his sturdy constitution gave the lie to the doctors. The nature of this illness has not been recorded, but it may be conjectured that it was caused by the enormous revels which accompanied the gorgeous and somewhat disorderly coronation of Charles II on St. George’s Day, 1661. The whole of London seems to have been more or less intoxicated with wine and loyalty on this occasion, and some riotous incidents occurred even on the stairs of Westminster Hall.⁴ If Pepys, a hardworking official of moderate means, suffered a little from the effects of the orgies of 23 April, 1661,⁵ it may be readily

¹ Merrie Drollerie, 1661, reprinted Ebsworth 1875, pp. 53, 54.

² Lyson’s “Historical Account of those Parishes of Middlesex not included in the Environs of London” (London, 1800), p. 109. Lysons quotes no authority for the story.

³ Letter from Eliz. Bodville to Lord Hatton, date ?July 1661. Hatton Corr., ed. Camden Soc., I. 21.

⁴ Pepys’s Diary, ed. Wheatley, II. 23 and note ad loc.

⁵ Pepys’s Diary, ed. Wheatley, II. p. 26.

1661 imagined that a young man of wealth and leisure like Sir Charles Sedley was laid up after the "extraordinary feasting" by which even sober John Evelyn admits that the Court celebrated the coronation of the restored King.

Although there is no other actual record of Sedley during the first three years after the Restoration, we know enough from the statements in the early memoirs to be certain that about this time he became a member of the Circle of Wits, as they came to be called, with whom Charles II was accustomed to spend his evenings. In 1661 Ormonde told Clarendon that "the king spent most of his time with confident young men, who abhorred all discourse that was serious, and, in the liberty they assumed in drollery and raillery, preserved no reverence towards God or man, but laughed at all sober men, and even at religion itself."¹ Sir Charles Sedley was certainly one of these "confident young men" if we may believe Anthony à Wood and the author of the "Memoir" of 1722. The latter writes, "It happen'd by him in respect of the King, as is said of the famous Cardinal Richlieu, viz. That they who recommended him to the King, thereby supplanted themselves, and afterwards envied him; but with this Difference between the Cardinal and Sir Charles, viz. That the latter was never ungrateful." The meeting-place of the Wits where Charles went to hear what Clarendon ironically calls "the nightly conversation" was the house of Barbara Palmer, the King's mistress, whose contemptible husband, Roger Palmer, was created Earl of Castlemaine in 1662, and it is likely that it was at Lady Castlemaine's that Sedley first met the King.

The author of the "Memoir" writes that "when he had a Taste of the Court, as the King never would part with him, so he never would part with the King; and yet two things happen'd to his Damage in it:

¹ Clarendon's "Life," I. 354, 355.

First his Estate was never the better . . . and secondly c. 1661 his Morals much the worse. /

"The King delighted in him to an Excess, and he pleas'd his Majesty in one thing, in which he eminently differ'd from all the rest of the Wits of the Court, viz. That he never ask'd the King for any thing, and they were always a begging of him." This was indeed a recommendation to a king like Charles whose pockets were always empty.

The leading spirit of the "nightly congregation," as Clarendon calls it, was the brilliant, wealthy and mercurial Duke of Buckingham, Dryden's Zimri, who

In the course of one revolving Moon,
Was Chymist, Fidler, States Man, and Buffoon;
Then all for Women, Painting, Rhiming, Drinking;
Besides ten thousand freaks that dy'd in thinking.

Another prominent figure was Charles Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, who was about a year older than Sedley. Prior writes tactfully of this young nobleman that "coming very Young into the Possession of two plentiful Estates and in an Age when Pleasure was more in Fashion than Business, he turned his Parts rather to Books and Conversation than to Politicks."¹ Other "confident young men" were Fleetwood Shepherd, Henry Savile, Baptist May, Henry Killigrew and Sir Charles Berkeley. Anthony à Wood describes the first-named in a sentence that summarizes the whole group: "after his majesty's Restoration he retir'd to London, hang'd on the court, became a debauchee and atheist."²

There is no doubt that the King enjoyed Sedley's conversation, which must have often enlivened those supper parties at Lady Castlemaine's, where, to the scandal of his subjects, his Majesty was to be found every night. It was very likely on some such occasion that he "singl'd him (i.e. Sedley) out for the best

¹ Prior's Dedication to "Poems on Several Occasions," 8vo, 1709.

² "Athenæ Oxonienses," ed. Bliss, IV. 627.

c. 1661 Genius of the Age, and frequently told his Familiars that Sedley's Stile, whether in Writing or Discourse would be the Standard of the English Tongue." Sir Charles's criticisms were doubtless listened to attentively by the patron of Dryden and Betterton, and the King told him one day in jest that "Nature had given him a Patent to be Apollo's Viceroy."¹

Round the Wits clustered a throng of their would-be imitators, the Dapper-wits, Woodcocks and Tattles, whose aping of the real "man of parts" provides such frequent subjects for contemporary comedy. These Fops, as they were called, were youths of the same class as the Wits, but who lacked the necessary mental equipment to be either tolerable writers or good companions. One of the chief joys of Sedley and his friends was the baiting or "smoking" of such cox-1662/63 combs. In the winter of 1662/3 Sir Charles took part in such a baiting, the victim of which was the second Earl of Chesterfield, whom we have already seen among London's gay butterflies in Oliver's time. The whole affair is in the style of a "fête galante" of Watteau or Fragonard.

According to Hamilton (whose description is an exquisite diminuendo) the Earl "had a very agreeable face, a fine head of hair, an indifferent shape and a worse air," and in the pages of De Grammont's Memoirs we see him strutting like a peacock among the courtiers at Whitehall with his beautiful neglected Countess by his side. Round this beauty the gallants cluster like flies on a jar of honey, and foremost among them is the still young and handsome James, Duke of York. There is a scene in Lady Chesterfield's apartments, whither her brother Lord Arran has brought the Duke, ostensibly to borrow her fine guitar. Unfortunately the Earl happens to be there, and he is compelled to look on while Arran plays innumerable sarabands to the Duke, and Lady Chesterfield "accompanies him with her eyes.”¹ When the well-known 1662/63 incident of the green stockings² has confirmed Chesterfield’s suspicions, he commits what, in this world of cloud-cuckoldry, is the unforgivable sin of showing his jealousy and hurries the lady off to his country seat in mid-winter. Then “God only knows what a terrible attack there was made upon his rear,” and Sedley and Buckhurst are mentioned among the Wits who bombarded the unfortunate Earl with innumerable lampoons.³

¹ Memoir prefixed to Briscoe's edition of 1722, p. 5.

We must now turn aside from the world of pleasure and gallantry in order to look at the more sordid realities of the street and tavern life which lay behind it. The Wits were something a great deal more interesting than mere courtiers. They were the inheritors of the great traditions of the literary and Bohemian tavern clubs of the days of Shakespeare and Ben Jonson, which they handed on to their successors, the circle of Addison and Steele at the beginning and that of Johnson and Goldsmith in the middle of the eighteenth century. The frequency of tavern scenes in the contemporary comedy of manners, which is largely a mirror of the life of the Wits, shows that much of their time was spent in these places.⁴ Their

¹ Hamilton’s “Memoirs of Count Grammont,” ed. Gordon Goodwin, I. 175.

² Ibid., I. 179, 180.

³ Ibid., II. 2. Rochester and Etherege are mentioned by Hamilton as taking part in this onslaught, but this must be a mistake, as probably neither came to Court till 1664 (see p. 68 below). The baiting of Chesterfield can be dated by a reference in Pepys’s Diary (ed. Wheatley, II. 384).

⁴ For a contemporary description of a tavern see “The Character of a Tavern” (4to, 1675), from which I give an extract: “A Tavern is an Academy of Debauchery, where the Devil teaches the seven deadly sins instead of Sciences, a Tipling-School a degree above an Ale-house, where you may be drunk with more credit and Apology, ’tis the Randevious of Gallants, the Good Fellowes’ Paradice, and the Miser’s Terrour. . . . ’Tis a Bedlam of Wits, where men are rather mad than merry, here one breaking a Jest on the Drawer, or perhaps a

- c. 1663 favourite houses seem to have been at Charing Cross, in the neighbourhood of the Royal Mews, and in the maze of narrow streets between Drury Lane and Covent Garden. Locket's, so called from its proprietor, Adam Locket,¹ was the chief of the Charing Cross taverns. The great haunt of the Wits in the Covent Garden quarter seems to have been the Rose in Russell Street, which adjoined the Drury Lane Playhouse, and was still a fashionable house in the time of Hogarth.² It was kept by a Mr. Long and subsequently by his widow, and seems to have shared with Locket's the honour of being the usual dining-place of Sir Charles Sedley and his friends.³ A special attraction, which doubtless had some share in drawing the Wits to this house, was a very pretty barmaid—"a lilly at the bar"—as one of them calls her in a letter written many years after.⁴ A contemporary descrip-

Candlestick or Bottle over his Crown, there another repeating scraps of Old Plays or some Bawdy Song . . . whilst all with loud hooting and laughing confound the noise of Fidlers who are properly called a Noise, for no Musick can be heard for them."

¹ Probably founded soon after the Restoration. It was a well-known house by 1675, when Wycherley mentions it as being frequented by courtiers ("The Country Wife," IV. 3). On the other hand, it did not exist at the time of the Civil War if we may believe Dr. King's "Art of Cookery" (1709):

"The fate of things is always in the dark;
What Cavalier would know St. James's Park?
For Locket's stands where gardens once did spring,
And wild ducks quack where grasshoppers did sing."

² It is the scene of Plate III. of the "Rake's Progress." There was more than one tavern of this name.

³ Cf. Etherege's "The Man of Mode" (4to, 1676, I. i.), where Etherege (Young Bellair) says, "Where do you dine?" Rochester (Dorimant) answers, "At Long's or Locket's," and Sedley (Medley) adds, "At Long's let it be." For this identification of the characters of "The Man of Mode" see below, p. 71.

⁴ Sir George Etherege's "Ratisbon Letter Book," Add. MS. 11513, f. 163 (to Mr. Will Richards, 2/12 Feb., 1687/8).

tion of a barmaid helps us to visualise the "lilly." c. 1663
 "You must first appear at the Bar, where Madam Minks, with her Head behung with as many Toys as their Bush, sits like the Goddess Semele (Mother of Bacchus) under her all-commanding Canopy."¹ Near the Rose in Russell Street was the "great Coffee-house" kept by William Urwin, and usually known as Will's. We learn from Pepys² that by the winter of 1663/4 it was already a well-known meeting-place of the Wits, and it was there that Dryden was to hold his court in later years. The taverns were frequently cook-shops or restaurants, and there was often a daily ordinary. Conversation and manners were remarkably free, and the greatest nobles in England might be seen choosing pieces off the spit, cheek by jowl with members of the humblest classes.³ Riotous conduct was naturally common in places where unlimited supplies of liquor could be obtained at all hours. The scene of the most famous of all the drunken frolics of the Wits was a tavern called the Cock in Bow Street, a turning off Russell Street. The Cock was kept by a woman called Oxford Kate,⁴ and, like many of the Covent Garden taverns, was probably a house of no very good reputation. The escapade which took place there was sufficiently foolish and disgusting, and furnishes an effective contrast to Hamilton's rose-tinted picture. However, it is surely absurd to speak of the wild pranks of some hot-headed youths in their cups as though they were monstrous sins, and, taking into consideration the general softening of manners, the affair is perhaps

¹ "Character of a Tavern," 1675, p. 3.

² Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), IV. 33.

³ Cf. "Mémoires et Observations Faites par un Voyageur en Angleterre à La Haye, 1698" (by H. M. de V. Henry Misson de Valbourg), pp. 241, 242.

⁴ It is called "Oxford Kate's" by Shadwell in "The Sullen Lovers" (4to, 1668), V. i.

c. 1663 comparable to the more reckless "rags" of modern students, having, like them, an element of humour that only the stiffest-grained Puritan could fail to notice.

This was the second scene of aristocratic debauchery which scandalised the graver citizens of Westminster in 1663 the spring of 1663. The first had been enacted at an entertainment given by the young Earl of Oxford¹ in honour of General Monk, now Duke of Albemarle, on 12 May.² According to a letter of De Comminges, the French Ambassador, "all the young men of quality" were present, and we may be sure that Lord Buckhurst and Sir Charles Sedley were among them. The banquet was followed by a revel which ended in a violent quarrel, during which periwigs were pulled off and swords were drawn. When the combatants had been separated, some of them accompanied the Duke to his lodgings in Whitehall Palace, where they continued drinking till nightfall, and, after having been provided with supper by their new host, carried on the bout till the small hours of the morning, "each man being resolved to drink his neighbour under the table." The Duke, who had the strongest head of all present, hit on an excellent device for getting rid of his uninvited guests. He handed to each gentleman a goblet (un hanap) of such a size that the whole company was rendered senseless for many hours—with the exception of the host, who calmly left them to their fate and went off to attend a debate at the House of Lords. 1663

¹ This was Aubrey de Vere, the twentieth and last Earl (1626–1703), described by Macaulay as "a man of loose morals, but of inoffensive temperament and courtly manners."

² Letter from De Comminges to Lionne printed in Wheatley's "Pepysiana," App. IX. p. 292. De Comminges' letter is dated "15 mai." He says that the Earl of Oxford's party had taken place three days before. Pepys, who gives a less detailed account of the affair, says (on the 15 May) that "it happened two days ago." Perhaps the divergence is accounted for by the fact that the revel started in the afternoon and ended the following morning (Pepys's Diary, ed. Wheatley, III. 122). Pepys's comment is, "To such a degree of madness is the nobility of this age come."

On 16 June,¹ about a month after this Rabelaisian feast, passers-by in Bow Street, Covent Garden, were treated to a spectacle which must have convinced the more puritanical that London would soon share the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah.² Three young men of fashion, having doubtless dined very well and being "all inflam'd with strong liquors," appeared on the balcony of the Cock Tavern. They were Sir Charles Sedley, Lord Buckhurst, and Sir Thomas Ogle, Knight, of Pinchbeck, Lincolnshire (destined to become a highly respectable Governor of Chelsea College, where he died in 1702).³ The trio stripped themselves stark naked,⁴ and Sedley, after performing ¹ According to the Rev. C. N. Sutton's "Historical Notes of Withiam," etc. (1902), Withiam Church in Sussex was burnt down on this date. Now Anthony à Wood states emphatically that the fire took place on the same day as the Bow Street affair. It was certainly an extraordinary coincidence that the church which contained the tombs of the Sackville family should have been mysteriously burnt in a great storm on the very day on which the young heir was taking part in a drunken and blasphemous orgy. Doubtless the superstitious made the most of such an opportunity.

² This account of the affair is pieced together from Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), III. 191; Anthony à Wood's "Life and Times," ed. Clark, I. 476-7, II. 335-6, and "Athenæ Oxonienses" (ed. Bliss), IV. 731; Johnson's Life of Dorset ("Lives of the Poets," ed. Hill, I. 303); Siderfin's Reports, I. 168; Keble's Reports, I. 620, and Col. Prideaux's letter to Notes and Queries, 9th Series, Vol. VIII. p. 151. Pepys heard of the frolic and the trial from Mr. Batten on 1 July, 1663.

³ Le Neve's "Knights" (Harl. Soc.), p. 93; Luttrell's "Brief Relation," V. 212.

⁴ Wood says in his Diary ("Life and Times," II. 335): "They all (I am sure Sedley) . . . stripped themselves naked." Pepys only mentions Sedley as having "shown his nakedness." Was this a tribute to the "State of Nature" which may have been the theme of part of the sermon? It is interesting to compare Rochester's remark to Burnet that he and his friends "in their Frolicks they would have chosen sometimes to go naked if they had not feared the people" (Burnet's "Life and Death of Rochester," 6th ed., 1724, p. 28). It seems, however, to have been a common practice among seventeenth-century revellers to divest themselves of all or part of their clothes. Judge

1663 certain disgusting pranks¹ (which Pepys and Anthony à Wood relate in plain English), preached a kind of mock sermon,² probably in ribald imitation of a Puritan divine, to a large crowd of over "1000 persons," who had assembled outside the tavern. It is a pity that there was no stenographer present to take down this remarkable discourse for the benefit of posterity. Its main drift is said by one contemporary³ to have been "blasphemy" and by another⁴ "abusing of scripture." Leaving theology, the orator turned to medicine, and imitating the harangues of the itinerant quacks, who at that time were a common sight in the streets of London, began to enlarge upon the merits of "such a powder as should make all the women of the town run after him."⁵ The crowd, which probably contained a large Puritan element, greeted Jeffreys and his cronies "stripped into their shirts" at a wild debauch at Alderman Duncomb's, according to Reresby ("Memoirs," ed. Ivatt, p. 282), and Etherege and his friends danced stark naked at Ratisbon according to his horrified secretary ("Ratisbon Letter-Book," ad fin.).

¹ It may be remarked that the full details of the pranks played by Sedley prior to the "sermon" are not printed by Wheatley. They may be seen in the Rev. Mynors Bright's complete transcription in the Library of Magdalene College, Cambridge, which I have been allowed to examine by the courtesy of the Librarian.

² Note that Etherege's "Medley" in "The Man of Mode" (4to, 1676, Act V. sc. i.), who is probably a portrait of Sedley, used to get "rhetorically drunk." The phrase may well be a reminiscence of this scene.

³ Anthony à Wood.

⁴ Pepys.

⁵ The idea of masquerading as an itinerant quack always had a fascination for the Restoration gallants. Perhaps they owed the notion to Ben Jonson's "Volpone," Act II. sc. i. Buckingham is supposed to have adopted the disguise of a "Jack Pudding" in order to visit London under the Protectorate, and to have erected a stage at Charing Cross, where he sang ballads and threw into the coach of his sister a bundle of important letters (see Lady Burghclere's "Life of Buckingham," p. 28). Later, Rochester disguised himself as a German doctor "and practised on Tower Hill under the name of 'Alexander Bendo.'" A Speech "To all Gentlemen and Ladies and others, whether of City, Town or Country," supposed to have been delivered by him in this Sedley's sermon with showers of stones. The orator ¹⁶⁶³ and his friends replied by flinging down bottles,¹ but were finally driven to take shelter in the tavern, while the mob expressed their disapprobation of atheism and drunkenness by breaking the windows.

The Puritans or "fanaticks" naturally took full advantage of such an incident in order to cast discredit on the Court. They are said to have "aggravated it to the utmost" by making it "the most scandalous thing in nature, and nothing more reproachful to religion than that," and the scandal was so great that even Charles II's Government could not neglect it. Sedley, as the chief culprit,² was summoned to appear before Sir Robert Foster,³ Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, an old-fashioned, high-minded Cavalier of the school of Ormonde and Clarendon, to whom such escapades were especially odious as casting discredit on the whole party. The case came on before the end of June,⁴ and, from the gossip heard by Pepys character, is printed in several editions of his works. Perhaps he took some hints from Sedley's oration.

¹ This detail is from Keble's note on the case (Reports 13-17, Charles II, p. 620). The bottles were not empty: see Appendix I, pp. 308-9.

² Wood says that the "company" were summoned before the Lord Chief Justice. Legal proceedings, however, seem to have been taken only against Sedley. Col. W. F. Prideaux' comment is worth quoting: "His (Sedley's) fate compared with Buckhurst's exemplifies the common saying that one man may steal a horse while another is hanged for looking over the hedge. Johnson in his 'Life of Dorset' quotes Rochester's remark, 'I know not how it is, but Lord Buckhurst may do what he will yet is never in the wrong. Poor Sedley, on the other hand, was never in the right.' " (Letter in Notes and Queries, 9th Series, Vol. VIII. pp. 157, 158, August 24, 1901.)

³ Wood says incorrectly that Sir Robert Hyde tried Sedley. Hyde did not succeed Foster at the King's Bench till the latter's death in October 1663.

⁴ Pepys heard of both frolic and trial on 1 July, so the trial must have been soon after the "misdemeanours."

1663 and Anthony à Wood and the quaint jargon of Siderfin's Reports, we can form some idea of what took place.

It may be supposed that the court was filled with courtiers on the day of the trial. The reading of the indictment, which gave a detailed account of the affair, must have given considerable amusement to an audience who knew quite well that the men who were being charged with having broken "the King's Peace" were intimate friends of the King himself. The case had a certain amount of technical interest to lawyers, as none of Sedley's actions was strictly punishable by law¹ at that time. Cases of immorality and indecency had formerly been tried by the Star Chamber, which inherited these functions from the old ecclesiastical courts. The Star Chamber had been abolished for ever by the Long Parliament, and it was not clear which, if any, tribunal had jurisdiction in the cases which it had formerly tried. Sedley alone apparently of the three offenders was charged with "several misdemeanours against the King's Peace," though Buckhurst also seems to have been in court. Sir Robert Foster told the baronet from the bench that "as the Star Chamber no longer existed, this Court was now Custos Morum of the King's subjects, and it was high time to Punish such profane Actions committed against all decency." He also said that "it was for him and such wicked wretches as he was that God's anger and judgments hang over us," and "called him sirrah many times." Being told that Buckhurst was in court, he asked "if it was that Buck-hurst who was lately charged with robbery,¹ and 1663 when he answered Yes, he asked whether he had so soon forgot his deliverance at that time, and that it would have more become him to have been at his prayers begging God's forgiveness than now running into such courses again." The Lord Chief Justice asked Sedley if he had read "a book called the Compleat Gentleman," referring to Henry Peacham's well-known work (first published 1622, reprinted 1634 and 1661).² Sedley replied irrelevantly (but perhaps not wholly untruly) that "set aside his lordship, he had read more books than himself."³ He was asked if he would stand his trial at the Bar, but took the sensible course of confessing the indictment and throwing himself on the mercy of the court. Judgment was then passed that, "as he was of a very ancient Family of the County of Kent, and as his Estate was encumbered (since the Court did not intend his ruin but reform), he should be fined 2000 marks, imprisoned for a week without Bail and bound over for good behaviour for three years."⁴ His parting shot at Old

¹ "There being no law against him for it," Pepys (ed. Wheatley, III. 192). "Henry Fielding quoted Sedley's case as a precedent in his Charge to the Grand Jury . . . held for the City and Liberty of Westminster . . . 29 June, 1749" (Works, ed. Murphy, 1806, X. 170).

For a modern view of the legal aspect of the case see Judge Parry's "What the Judge Thought" (Fisher Unwin, 1922, p. 845).

¹ Buckhurst with Edward Sackville, his brother, Sir Henry Belasyse and others mortally wounded an innocent tanner near Waltham's Cross in February 1661/2. They are said to have mistaken him for a robber and to have taken money from his pockets under the impression that it was stolen property. They were apprehended on a charge of robbery and murder, but the Grand Jury only found a Bill for manslaughter, and they were apparently acquitted (Pepys's Diary, ed. Wheatley, II. 193 and note). It must have been to this affair that Sir Robert Foster was alluding.

² Perhaps Sir Robert Foster was thinking of the following passage: "Above all, learn betimes to avoid excessive drinking, than which there is no one Vice more common and reigning, and ill beseming a Gentleman, which if grown to a habit is hardly left, remembering that hereby you become not fit for any thing, having your reason degraded, your body distempered, your soul hazarded, your esteem and reputation abased, while you sit taking your unwholsome healths—ut iam vertigine tectum Ambulet, & geminis exsurgat mensa lucernis." ("The Compleat Gentleman," by Henry Peacham, 1661, 4to, p. 271.)

³ See the list of some books probably in Sir Charles Sedley's library, Appendix II, pp. 324 seq.

⁴ Judge Parry in "What the Judge Thought" says incorrectly that

1663 Father Antic the Law was amusing but unfortunately unquotable.¹

The week spent by Sir Charles in prison could have certainly involved no great hardship. In those days, if a prisoner had sufficient money to pay the rent of a room and the perquisites of the gaolers, he could live in far greater comfort than could the miserable wretches who herded on the "common side."² The imposition of the fine of two thousand marks had a curious sequel. Sedley is said to have asked young Harry Killigrew (who had married Mary Savage, Lady Sedley's sister),³ a Groom of the King's Bedchamber, and another gentleman to beg the King for a remission of the fine. The story goes that Killigrew and the other courtier begged the money from King Charles and then refused to pay Sedley "twopence" of it.⁴ Whatever truth there may be in this tale, it is certain that Sedley paid one thousand marks (£333 6s. 8d.), which, like all fines in those days, actually went into the King's Privy Purse. A minute among the State Papers⁵ shows that this sum was not paid till July 1664, and was then granted to Sedley was fined "two thousand marks or in the alternative seven days." Siderfin's report of the case (Appendix I, pp. 307-8) shows clearly that the fine was an addition, and not an alternative to the sentence of imprisonment. Keble's report of the case gives "one year" as the period for which Sedley was bound over to keep the peace.

¹ It may be found in Wood's "Life of Sedley" ("Athenæ Oxonienses," IV. 731).

² See "The History of Thomas Ellwood," the Quaker, written by himself, for a vivid picture of the interior of Restoration prisons.

³ "The Ancient and Noble Family of the Savages of the Ards," by G. F. A(rmstrong), 1888, p. 53. This Henry or Harry Killigrew was the son of Thomas Killigrew and his wife Cecilia Crofts, and was born in 1637. He was Groom of the Bedchamber both to the Duke of York and to the King, and succeeded his father as Master of the Revels.

⁴ See Anthony à Wood, "Life and Times," ed. Clark ("Athenæ Oxonienses," IV. 331).

⁵ See Appendix I, p. 309.

"George Hamilton, Esquire." This George Hamilton 1664 must be the famous Anthony's brother, formerly page to King Charles and one of his most intimate friends. It would seem that the King exercised his prerogative of mercy in order to reduce the fine by one-half.

About a year after the Bow Street affair, the heroes of that episode made the acquaintance of two young men who had recently come to Court and who proved notable accessions to the circle of Wits. John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester, son of one of the loyalest servants of Charles I, at this date a thin-faced, precocious boy of sixteen, had just made the Grand Tour with his Scottish tutor, Dr. Balfour. On his return he was presented to the King, who took him into high favour and made him a Gentleman of the Bedchamber.¹ 1664/65 Buckhurst was one of his colleagues in this office, and it was, doubtless, through that nobleman that he made the acquaintance of Sir Charles Sedley. The corruption of his naturally modest character, which the good Bishop Burnet deploras, was probably due in some measure to his new friends. The other new member of the fraternity that assembled at the Rose and Will's was a fair man of about thirty with a pale, handsome, debauched face.² His name was George Etherege, and his acquaintance with the Wits seems to have originated in the extraordinary success of his lively comedy, "The Comical Revenge, or Love in a Tub," produced at the Duke's Theatre in 1664/5.³ He received the nicknames of Gentle George and Easy Etherege, and his vivacious and witty con-

¹ D. N. B., s.a. J. Wilmot, Earl of Rochester.

² Oldys's Notes to Langbaine (Brit. Mus., c. 28, 9, 1, p. 137): ["Sir George] was a fair man but spoilt his face with drinking."

³ Pepys saw it on 4 January, 1664/5 (Wheatley, IV. 325), but he does not say that this was the first performance. That Etherege became acquainted with Buckhurst (and hence doubtless with Sedley) through this play is proved by his own statement in the dedication (4to, 1664) to Buckhurst. "The Writing of it (the play) was a means to make me known to your Lordship."

c. 1664/65 versation must have delighted his friends. Sedley, now a short, plump, round-faced youth with merry black eyes, a slightly aquiline nose and full voluptuous lips,¹ was known among these young sparks as "Little Sid." He was especially noted for the magnificence of his lace neckcloths and for his ready wit, which usually took the form of absurd similes which convulsed his hearers with laughter.² Many years later a certain "old Mrs. Partridge" told Oldys, the eighteenth-century antiquarian,³ a tale about Sir Charles's neckcloths which probably refers to this "very merry laughing, dancing, drinking" decade that followed the Restoration. Sedley's friends, knowing his weakness, are said to have proposed one of those frolics where every drinker had to throw into the fire a certain article of their dress, and thus compelled him to sacrifice a gorgeous cravat of point d'Espagne or point de Venice. The Baronet took a heartless revenge. When he was next in the same company, he arranged to have a tooth drawer in attendance, and, having proposed a toast of the same nature, called in the dentist and made him draw a rotten tooth which had been troubling him for some time. The rest of the company, in spite of "tears and oaths," had to follow his example, while the proposer of the toast coolly remarked, "Patience, gentlemen, Patience, you know—you promised I should have frolick too." Such stories as these are merely tantalising fragments of the great legend of the Restoration Court. Like many other legends it has never been embodied in an epic. Hamilton's delightful book is too slight to deserve that title, though it might perhaps have been applied to those Memoirs of Rochester which perished in the flames.¹ The four central figures were Rochester, Buckhurst, Sedley and Etherege. Burnet in his *History*² gives a thumbnail sketch of three of them. "Lord Dorset" (i.e. Buckhurst), he writes, "was a generous, good-natured and modest man . . . so much oppressed with phlegm that till he was a little heated with wine he scarce ever spoke, but was upon that exaltation a very lively man. Never was so much ill-nature in a pen as his, joined with so much good-nature as is in himself, even to success. . . . He is bountiful to run himself into difficulties and charitable to a fault, for he commonly gives all he has about him, when he meets an object that moves him. But he was so lazy that, though the King seemed to court him for a favourite, he would not give himself the trouble that belonged to that post." Rochester "was naturally modest, till the Court corrupted him. His wit had in it a peculiar brightness to which none could ever arrive. He gave himself up to all sorts of extravagance, and to the wildest frolics that a wanton wit could devise. . . . He would have gone about the streets as a beggar and made love as a porter. He set up a stage as an Italian mountebank. He was for some years always drunk and was ever doing some mischief." Sedley "had a more sudden and copious wit which furnished a perpetual run of discourse; but it was not so correct as Lord Dorset's or so sparkling as Lord Rochester's."

¹ See Oldys's Notes to Langbaine (No. 1), Appendix I, p. 318. Cf. also the Knole Park portrait.

² I deduce this from Mulgrave's "Little Sid for Simile renowned" ("Essay on Satyr," see p. 145 below). "Little Sid" must have been his usual nickname, as it is also used in the anonymous lampoon called "The Ladies' March" (Brit. Mus., Harl. MS. 7137, f. 31, see p. 140).

³ See Oldys's notes (No. 6), Appendix I, p. 319.

Fortunately there is another source of information concerning the Wits besides the gossip of the eighteenth century and Burnet's meagre notes. They were all partly conscious that their lives were the stuff of which legends are made, and, having a genuine literary gift, tried themselves in plays and verses to

¹ D. N. B., s.a. John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester.

² Burnet's "History of My Own Time," ed. Osmund Airy, 1897, I. 476, 477.

c. 1664/65 express the spirit of the society in which they lived. Etherege, after several attempts, achieved a certain measure of success in this very difficult task. His comedy, "The Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter"¹ (4to, 1676), is almost certainly neither more nor less than a series of scenes from the lives of Rochester, Sedley and the author, recollected from the early years of the Restoration Court. By substituting real names for the fictitious ones in "Gentle George's" comedy,² it is possible to obtain an excellent idea of the daily life and conversation of the Wits. The first scene is incomparably vivid. We are in Rochester's dressing-room, probably about midday. The Earl is in gown and slippers awaiting the ministrations of his valet. Hearing "Foggy Nan," the Orange-Woman, chattering below, he sends his man Handy to fetch her up and amuses himself by listening to her racy gossip while he samples one of her peaches. She is telling him about a beautiful young lady who is lodging at her house, when Sedley bursts in and the following dialogue takes place.

¹ Congreve drew the inspiration of much of his exquisite art from Etherege's masterpiece, and hence, at second hand, from the lives of the Wits.

² See Oldys's Notes to Langbaine (Brit. Mus., C. 28, 9, 1, p. 187). Note to Life of Sir G. Etherege: "The Characters in this play were all from Real Persons or most of them, as Sr. Fopling, Beau Hewit, Dorimant, Lord Rochester and even the shoemaker that got vast trade by this representation of him. Himself he has also set forth under the Character of Young Bevil (sic) or Medley." Oldys must be mistaken about "Medley," for it can hardly be doubted, merely from the resemblance of the names, that a portrait of Sedley was intended. This identification is confirmed by the phrase "rhetorically drunk" applied to Medley, which must refer to the affair at the Cock Tavern. M. E. D. Forgues in his article on Rochester in La Revue des Deux Mondes, August, September, 1857, identifies "Medley" with Sedley. Finally, cf. Aubrey's remark that "Shakespeare's comedies will remain witt as long as the English tongue is understood, for that he handles mores hominum. Now our present writers reflect so much upon particular persons and coxcombeities, that twenty years hence they will not be understood." ("Short Lives," ed. Clark, II. 227.)

SEDLEY: Rochester, my Life, my Joy, my darling c. 1664/65
Sin; how dost thou?

ORANGE-WOMAN: Lord, what a filthy trick these Men have got of kissing one another (She spits).

SEDLEY: Why do you suffer this Cart-load of Scandal to come so near you, and make your Neighbours think you are so improvident to need a Baw'd?

ORANGE-WOMAN: Good, now we shall have it, you did but want him to help you: come, pay me for my Fruit.

SEDLEY: . . . You are an Insignificant Brandy Bottle.

ROCHESTER: Nay, there you wrong her, three Quarts of Canary is her Business.

ORANGE-WOMAN: What you please, Gentlemen.

ROCHESTER: To him, give him as good as he brings.

ORANGE-WOMAN: Hang him, there is not such a Heathen in the Town again, except it be the Shoomaker without.

SEDLEY: I shall see you hold up your Hand at the Bar next Sessions for Murder, Huswife: that Shoomaker can take his Oath you are in Fee with the Doctors to sell Green Fruit to the Gentry, that Crudities may Breed Diseases.

The conversation turns again on the beauty about whom the Orange-Woman was gossiping when Sedley came in. Sir Charles is acquainted with the lady and describes her in an exquisite sentence:

"What alteration a Twelve-month may have bred in her I know not, but a year ago she was the beautifullest Creature I ever saw; a fine easie clean Shape, light brown Hair in abundance; her Features Regular, her Complexion clear and lively, large wanton Eyes, but above all a mouth that has made me Kiss it a Thousand times in Imagination, teeth white and even, And pretty pouting Lips, with a little moisture ever hanging on them like the Province Rose fresh on the c.1664/65 Bank, e'er the morning Sun has quite drawn up the Dew."¹

If this is a fair specimen of Sedley's conversational style, it is easy to understand why the King called him "Apollo's Viceroy," and the last phrase is probably one of the "similes" for which he was renowned.

The Earl and the Baronet are soon joined by Etherege. The new-comer is greeted as "a good third man," and the important question whether the company shall dine at Long's (the Rose) or Locket's discussed, and decided in favour of the latter. As Rochester's coach is not yet ready, they sally forth in sedan chairs to Charing Cross. In the afternoon we find Sedley paying a visit to two ladies of fashion.² A page arrives in advance to ask if the intrusion "will be troublesome." On the contrary they are both delighted, for Sedley is popular among the ladies on account of his good-nature and amusing conversation. "He's a very pleasant man," says Emilia. "He's a very necessary man among us Women," replies her aunt, Lady Townley. "He's not scandalous i' the least, perpetually contriving to bring good Company together, and always ready to stop Up at a gap at Ombre; then he knows all the little news o' the Town." The niece is equally charmed with the Baronet's conversation: "I love to hear him talk o' the Intrigues, let 'em Be never so dull in themselves, he'll make 'em pleasant i' the Relation." Later we are given a glimpse of the nature of the Intrigues which Sir Charles related so admirably: "Y' have an exact Account from the Great Lady i' the Box down to the little Orange Wench," he says to Emilia after regaling her with a choice morsel of Court gossip.

While Sir Charles is visiting Lady Townley and her niece, Rochester has "looked in at the Play," probably at the King's House at Drury Lane, where c. 1664/65 Mrs. Gwynne is doubtless acting in a new piece by Mr. Dryden. In the cool of the evening the two friends are found walking in the "Mail" (or as we now say the "Mall"),¹ the fine avenue on the north side of St. James's Park, which Charles II had planted with trees shortly after the Restoration. It is the hour of the fashionable promenade, and the twilight alleys are crowded with the fine ladies and women of the town in "Sky, and Pink, and Flame-coloured Taffetas,"² with gallants in periwigs and scented gloves, and drunken bullies singing catches as they reel from group to group. In the evening we find the three Wits dancing at the lodgings of some ladies of their acquaintance. Rochester slips off early to an assignation, but Sedley and Etherege stay on till midnight, drinking with their host, a bluff old gentleman of the "true Elizabeth breeding," and singing a merry chorus in praise of "the Pleasures of Love and the Joys of Good Wine." Finally, in the small hours of the morning, the whole company, escorted by fiddlers and carrying torches, repair to Rochester's lodgings in order to serenade the Earl. It is interesting to have this last reminiscence of Gentle George confirmed by a letter dated 4 February, 1664, which records that Sir Charles had recently taken part in a surprise visit of this kind in the company of the young Duke of Richmond and Lennox and his Grace's fiddlers.³

¹ "The Man of Mode" (4to, 1676), I. i. pp. 3, 4.

² Ibid., II. i. p. 20.

¹ "The Man of Mode" (4to, 1676), II. iii. Cf. also the following passage from Mrs. Behn's "Sir Patient Fancy" for the hour of the fashionable promenade. "Lodwick" is describing the day of a fashionable lady "Beginning at Eight, from which down to Twelve you ought to imploy in dressing, till Two at Dinner, till five in visits, till Seven at the Play, till Nine i' the Park" (etc.). (Works, ed. M. Summers, IV. 22.)

² Etherege's "She Wou'd if She Cou'd," III. ii. (Works, 8vo, 1704, p. 126).

³ Hist. MSS. Comm., Appendix to 6th Report, p. 364. (Sir R. Paston to his Wife, 6 February, 1664.)

1664/65 The background of this life of pleasure and gallantry was the comparatively new part of the town which had sprung up in the first half of the seventeenth century on what had formerly been the open country between London and Westminster. In the early years
c. 1664- of the reign of Charles II, it was a maze of narrow 66 streets of gabled wooden houses, bounded on the north by Holborn and the Oxford Road and on the south by the Strand. Beyond Holborn there was only a single row of houses, and a breeze from the north would bring the fresh airs of the fields into Drury Lane and Covent Garden.¹ In Sedley's comedy, "The Mulberry Garden," Olivia and Victoria tell their father that they are going to drive "either up into the City or towards the Park," and thus show that they are living in the new fashionable district. The young sparks drove and rode round the Ring or Tour of Hyde Park, still well outside the town, where Sir Charles must have appeared in even greater splendour than that which his brother had formerly flaunted in the eyes of the Puritans,² and, like Ned Estridge in "The Mulberry Garden," he probably galloped round it many a time for a wager on horseback. For pedestrians the favourite promenades were the Mall or Mail, where we have already seen Rochester and Sedley, and the New Exchange, an Arcade off the Strand, noted for pretty glove merchants and perfumers and Herringman's well-known bookshop.

When the Wits were not driving round the Ring or buying gloves for their mistresses in the New Exchange, they spent much of their time in the playing of outdoor games. Pall Mall, a robust ancestor of c. 1664—the modern croquet, was played before the Civil War ⁶⁶ on the site of the street that now bears its name. After the Restoration, when houses had been built in the old “Pall” Mall, a new Mail or Mall was laid out in St. James’s Park, where both the King and his brother often played.¹ Bowling was as fashionable as in the days of Sir John Suckling, and there was an alley in Whitehall where Pepys saw “lords and ladies” bowling on a fine summer day in 1662.² Sedley’s favourite game appears to have been tennis;³ not the degenerate lawn tennis of the moderns, but the ancient and strenuous game played in a covered court with a penthouse. There was a tennis court of this kind in Whitehall, and Charles II was an excellent player. Indoor games of cards and dice were equally popular, now that the shadow of Puritanism was removed. The most fashionable card game was the newly introduced Basset, upon which Gentle George wrote some pretty vers-de-société:

¹ See Newcourt and Faithorne's Map ("An Exact Delineation of the Cities of London and Westminster . . . by Richard Newcourt, W. Faithorne Sculpsit, 1658, engraved from the original by G. Larman, London, 1857").

² "Medley" in "The Man of Mode" (II. ii.) is said to "Understand an Equipage the best of any Man in Town."

“Let Equipage and Dress Despair
 Since Basset has come in;
 For nothing can oblige the Fair
 Like Mony and Morine.”⁴

It is strange to be reminded that in the city where the Wits were dancing, drinking and writing verses on Celia and the game of Basset, John Milton was sitting in darkness, meditating “Paradise Lost.” Once we almost seem to hear the voices of Little Sid, Gentle George and the Lords Buckhurst and Rochester

¹ Pepys, ed. Wheatley, II. 1.

² Ibid., II. 88.

³ Cf. the following passage in Etherege’s “Ratisbon Letter-Book,” f. 154 (Sir G. E. to Mr. Guy, 19 December, 1687): “I bungle away now & then a morning at Tennis, here is a pretty carré Court and players so exactly seiz’d for Sr. C. that were he here, he wou’d live in it.” The “carré” court is the smaller variety of tennis court. Cf. this allusion with the nickname “little Sid.”

⁴ Works (8vo, 1704), p. 287.

c. 1664 interrupting that solemn vision of Hell which the poet breaks off to speak of “Luxurious cities where the noyse

Of riot ascends above their loftiest Tow’rs
And injury and outrage : and when Night
Darkens the streets, then wander forth the Sons
Of Belial flown with insolence and wine.”

For Milton the young sparks of Whitehall and Drury Lane were only “Sons of Belial.” Yet the laughter of the diners at the Cock and the Rose and very audacity of their frolics were perhaps helping to keep alive a part of England which was as valuable as the strength and steadfastness of the Puritan.

CHAPTER IV

THE WITS AS MEN OF LETTERS

“B-st and Sydley, with two or three more Translators of Pompey, dispute in their claim,
But Apollo made them be turn’d out of door,
And bid them be gone like Fools as they came.

“My old Friend, Mr. Waller, what make you there,
Among those young Fellows that spoil the French plays?
The Session of the Poets to the tune of “Cook Lawrel.” (“Poems on State Affairs,” 1697, I., 221).

“... A Wit is like a running Horse, good for no earthly thing beside; when did you ever know any of ’em well with a great Man, or so much as taken down to a Lord’s house a Buck-hunting? They can drink, some of ’em; but then they talk of Philosophy, History, Poetry, as if they came into company to study; this stuff the Devil would not hear.”—
“A True Widow,” Act III (4to, 1679, p. 43).

It has been said that a libertine’s heart is trampled by pleasures as a playground is trampled by schoolboys till nothing green will grow there. Fortunately there is abundant evidence that Sedley, Rochester and their friends were not libertines of this kind. It is fair to these idle and debauched young scamps to emphasise the fact that they were also men of real culture who preserved much of that love of elegance and grace which had descended to them from the courtiers of the Renaissance, and which they were to hand on to their more civilised successors, the gentlemen of the eighteenth century. Not only were they all writers of distinction and friends and patrons of men of letters, but they were also enthusiastic and widely read students of literature, thoroughly appreciating the cynical grace of Latin poetry, the full-blooded drama of Elizabethan England,¹ and the elegant prose and verse of contemporary France. It has, indeed, been implied by one of the most distinguished historians of Restoration literature that the literary interests of Charles II's courtiers were merely due to a prevailing fashion, and that their culture was only a courtly veneer that covered the "unbridled and shameless debauchery of their lives."² That there is an element of truth in this diagnosis will be denied by nobody who has made it his business to read the quantities of inferior plays and feeble lyrics written by the gallants of the Restoration Court. But it is unjust to confuse the few real Wits, men of genuine talent and taste (who would probably have gained an important place in English literature if, like Dryden and Shadwell, they had been compelled to write for a living), with the numerous host of fine gentlemen who dashed off one or two insipid songs to Chloe or Phyllis or furnished a spicy prologue to a friend's play, and who, had they lived at the Court of George IV instead of that of Charles II, would probably never have written a line. Sedley was called by one of his earliest biographers "a man of wit and pleasure,"¹ and the title belongs equally to Etherege, Rochester and Buckhurst. If they were libertines, they were also artists, and like all true artists were essentially sincere. "They writ like themselves,"² says an author of the early eighteenth century of Sedley and his friends, and there was something not wholly bad in the composition of men who were capable of the grace of Sedley's best lyrics, the indignation of Rochester's satires, and the gaiety of Etherege's comedies. To form a just estimate of Sir Charles's character we must set against the lurid scene at the Cock Tavern the record of his literary career and friendships, which is, on the whole, an honourable one.

¹ The numerous revivals of the plays of Shakespeare, Jonson, Fletcher and Webster testify to this. Dennis writes of the "Merry Wives of Windsor" that "the late Duke of Buckingham, my Lord Normandy (sic), my Lord Dorset, my late Lord Rochester, Sir Charles Sidley, Dr. Frazer, Mr. Savil, Mr. Buckley were in Love with the Beauties of this Comedy." (Preface to "The Comical Gallant," 4to, 1702.)

² Beljame, "Le Public et Les Hommes de Lettres en Angleterre au dix-huitième Siècle" (Hachette, 1897). "Pour la littérature tout le monde en fit. On ne fut pas un galant sans être un bel esprit: les deux mots devinrent synonymes. Les hommes le plus à la mode, les courtisans les plus brillants, le comte de Rochester, Sir Charles Sedley, Villiers duc de Buckingham, le comte de Mulgrave, Sir Car Scroop, Edmund Waller Esquire, Lord Buckhurst, le duc et la duchesse de Newcastle furent des lettrés, des critiques, des auteurs . . . (p. 10). Au surplus, toutes ces grâces, toutes ces poétiques mièvreries ne sont qu'un faux semblant. Grattez le gentil-homme élégant d'alors, vous trouvez vite le débauché débridé et sans vergogne; il en est de même dans cette poésie: son marivaudage est tout de surface; si elle s'étudie à composer de petits vers tendres et langoureux, elle aime surtout à faire appel aux sens à exciter les désirs et, dans cet office, elle ne redoute pas le mot vif, cru au besoin" (p. 12). To support the last statement Beljame quotes Rochester's playful lines on Sedley's poetry, for the significance of which see Part II. p. 284.

As early as the winter of 1662/3 several young men ^{1662/63} of fashion made their formal entry into the world of letters under the ægis of the elegant Mr. Waller. They were Sir Charles Sedley, whom, as we have seen, Waller had probably known from his boyhood, Lord Buckhurst, Sir Edward Filmer, son of the ultra-royalist author of "Patriarca," and Sidney Godolphin, who was to achieve quite a different kind of fame from that of the companions of his youth.³ To these young

¹ Oldys's Note to Langbaine, No. 4 (Appendix I, p. 319).

² Henry Felton's "A Dissertation on the Reading of the Classics," 12mo, 1715, p. 65. The passage is worthy of quotation: "Sir Robert Howard, Sir Charles Sidley, Sir John Denham, Mr. Waller, Sir George Etherege, and I may add Mr. Walsh, writ like themselves; their Learning and Quality adorn each other, and you read their Education as Gentlemen, as well as Scholars, in their Compositions."

³ "Letters of Orinda to Poliarchus" (1705), p. 112, 10 January, 1662/3.

1662/63 men Waller doubtless gave a glowing description of the poet-courtiers of the days of Charles I, and, above all, of his friend Sir John Suckling, now the almost legendary type of a literary dandy. It is pleasant to picture this company assembling under the trees in the "Mail" and walking to Waller's new house in the pretty suburban road running north from St. James's Palace, since named St. James's Street. The conversation would naturally turn on the theatre, and especially, as all things French were in vogue, on the classical drama of France, now in the heyday of its triumph. Could the French riming tragedies be naturalised in England? It was resolved to answer this question by producing a joint translation of some of the plays of the great Corneille in English riming verse. The first to be chosen was "La Mort de Pompée," a piece which had been staged in France nearly twenty years before. Each gentleman made himself responsible for an act, the first being allotted to Waller and the last to Buckhurst. The results, which were not unpleasing, were probably handed round in manu-

"I long to hear what becomes of the other Translation of Pompey and what Opinion the Town and Court have of it; I have laid out several ways to get a Copy, but cannot yet procure one except only of the first Act that was done by Mr. Waller. Sir Edward Filmer did one, Sir Charles Sedley another, and my Lord Buckhurst another; but who the fifth I cannot learn." "Biographia Dramatica," s.a. "Pompey the Great," gives the Earl of Dorset, "Sir Charles Sedley and Mr. Godolphin" as the translators (ed. 1812, II, 172). Sidney Godolphin (1645-1712) was later to become a well-known statesman. He was made a Page of Honour to the King on 29 September, 1662. It is curious to notice that his relative, also named Sidney Godolphin (1610-43), had been known in the circle of Suckling by the same nickname ("Little Sid") as that which was given to Sedley at Charles II's Court (see Suckling's "Session of the Poets"). This early Sidney Godolphin was a poet of some merit. The D. N. B. attributes to him (and not to the future statesman) the share in "Pompey"; but it is surely impossible that he had anything to do with it, as he died in 1643.

script at Court, where they would meet with the hearty ^{1662/63} approval of the King, who was an ardent admirer of the French drama. Copies seem to have been in circulation as early as the second week in January 1662/3,¹ and by that time it is very likely the play had been acted at the private theatre called the Cockpit in Whitehall Palace.² These proceedings caused considerable perturbation to a young lady called Katherine Phillips, who, although only twenty-two years old, was already an aspirant to literary fame. She herself had produced an excellent translation of the same play, and was rather alarmed at being challenged by such fashionable rivals. Probably in December 1663/4 the work of the "Confederate translators," as ^{1663/64} Katherine contemptuously calls them, was acted for the first time in public by Sir William Davenant's company at the Duke's House or "Opera" in Lincoln's Inn Fields. Mrs. Phillips—or, to give her the name by which she was known in literary circles, the Matchless Orinda—describes the performance in a letter to Lady Temple dated 22 January, 1663/4.³ To judge from this letter it was not a great success. The actors were dressed in "English habits" without even the very half-hearted attempt at Roman costumes which it was customary to make in Restoration theatres. Cæsar,

¹ "Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus," 1705, p. 112, s.d. 10 January 1662/3. See above.

² The 1664 edition has epilogues both "to the King" and "the Duchess" "At St. James."

³ "Life and Letters of Martha Giffard," by J. G. Longe (George Allen, 1911), pp. 39, 40, where Orinda's letter is printed. It is dated 22 January, 1664 (i.e. 1663/4), and she says that "Pompey" was followed by 'Harry the 8th' (probably an adaptation of Shakespeare's play by Davenant). Now Pepys mentions that this "Harry the 8th" was being acted on 10 and 22 December, 1663/4, and he saw it himself on 1 January, so it is probable that "Pompey" was produced about Christmas time. Pepys specially notes the "shows and processions" in "Harry the 8th." Doubtless "Pompey" seemed very bare after such magnificence.

1663/64 who was very likely the great Thomas Betterton himself, appeared with "a feather and a staff" and was hissed off the stage. The "citizens' wives"—they would naturally form a large part of the audience of the Lincoln's Inn House—are said to have been chiefly responsible for this disaster, and it may well be imagined that, having been brought up on the bustling, highly-coloured old English drama, they found that especially when the speeches were unrelieved by any spectacular splendour.

"The French convey their Arguments too much In Dialogue; their Speeches are too long,"¹

1664 Early in 1664, "Pompey the Great, a Tragedy as it is acted by the Servants of His Highness the Duke of York, translated out of the French by certain Persons of Honour," was printed in a neat quarto and sold by Henry Herringham, the fashionable bookseller, at his shop at the Sign of the Blew Anchor in the Lower Walk of the New Exchange. Sedley's share in this translation was probably his first printed work. The "Persons of Quality" who had tried their hand at "Pompey" probably translated "Heraclius"² as their next contribution towards a complete English Corneille. "Heraclius" appears to have been acted, but was never published.³ Perhaps the translators were discouraged by the cold reception of "Pompey," which is recorded on its title page, where they felicitously quote Horace's complaint that "now even among the 1664 knights all pleasure has fled from the ear to the fickle eyes and to vain pomps."

¹ Sir W. Davenant, "The Play House to be Lett," Act I.

² See Orinda's letter in Longe's "Life of Lady Giffard," quoted above.

³ Lodowick Carlell published a translation of "Heraclius Emperor of the East" in 1664 (4to). In his "Advertizement," he writes that his translation was rejected by the actors in favour of another presumably by the "confederate translators" (see Orinda's letter quoted above, note 2): "Another Translation formerly design'd (after this seem'd to be accepted of) was perfected and acted, this not return'd to me until the very day." Pepys saw this play at the Duke's House on 8 March 1663/4.

As Sedley's career was closely connected with the drama for many years after the production of "Pompey," it is necessary at this point to glance at the condition of the English theatre during his youth. From the closing of the theatres in 1642¹ till the 1642-60 Restoration, public performances had been forbidden by law. Nevertheless, the actors often crept back to their old haunts—the Red Bull or the Cockpit—and acted scenes from Shakespeare and other dramatists to spellbound audiences, until a file of Puritan musketeers removed them to the Gate-house.² Probably Sir William Sedley, whose interest in the drama is shown by Tatham's dedication, and his brother Charles had frequented these illicit performances, and they may also have taken part in the amateur theatricals with which young people of quality sometimes amused themselves under the Protectorate.³ The Restoration of the King was bound to mean the restoration of the theatre, which was essentially a royalist institution. Already, when Monk was ruling in London, and everyone knew that the King's return was imminent, John Rhodes, a bookseller, who had once been wardrobe-keeper to King Charles I's old actors at the Blackfriars theatre, applied for and obtained a licence from the General to give public performances.⁴ He ¹ On 2 September, 1642, plays were forbidden "during these times of humiliation." They were altogether suppressed by an Ordinance of 22 October, 1647, and a still stricter decree was issued on 11 February, 1648.

² Cf. Whitelocke's "Memorials," 30 December, 1649. "Some Stage-Players in St. John's Street were apprehended by Troopers, their Clothes taken away, and themselves carryd to Prison." Also Middlesex County Records, III. 279-80, where similar cases are recorded in May 1659.

³ Cf. the "Letters of Dorothy Osborne," ed. E.A. Parry, 1903, p. 270.

⁴ Lowe's "Life of Betterton" (1891), p. 60.

1642-60 "opened" at the old theatre called the Cockpit in Drury Lane, possibly before the King reached London. This Drury Lane "Cockpit" (not to be confused with the King's private theatre in Whitehall Palace of the same name) was one of the old "private" houses of the days before the Civil War, which, unlike the "public" theatres (such as the Globe and the Fortune), had roofed auditoria and were lit by candles. It was probably here that (according to Pepys) the Dukes of York and Gloucester saw Jonson's "Silent Woman" in June 1660,¹ and it is very likely that Sir Charles Sedley was among the first patrons of Rhodes's venture. The Cockpit was not left alone in the field for long. Two other companies were soon playing at the old Red Bull, a "public" or partly unroofed theatre in St. John's Street, Clerkenwell, and at a "private" house in Salisbury Court, Strand. The Red Bull company consisted of old players who had survived from the pre-Commonwealth theatre, and probably included such excellent actors as Michael Mohun and Charles Hart,² but against these veterans Rhodes was able to pit a certain Thomas Betterton, still unknown to fame, but destined to become the greatest actor of the Restoration theatre. From the Restoration to November 1660 the theatrical world was in a state of confusion and anarchy complicated by the constant interference of Sir Henry Herbert, Charles I's old Master of the Revels, who, having survived the Civil War and the Commonwealth, attempted to re-assert his authority over the players in order to extract what profit he could from the revived theatre. Some kind of order was restored by the erection of two companies under royal patent, their managers being Sir William Davenant and Thomas Killigrew (father to Lady Sedley's brother-in-law). These two men were both admirably 1660 fitted for the work of carrying on and strengthening the theatrical tradition. They were keen students of the latest foreign improvements in the production of plays, and it is to them that the form of the modern theatre owes in a large measure its origin. Killigrew's company was called the King's Servants. It was composed chiefly of the old Red Bull actors, and acted at first in a Gibbon's tennis court in Vere Street, Clare Market. Davenant's company (known as the Duke of York's) was composed mainly of the younger actors like Betterton, and played at first at the Salisbury Court House, but at the end of May 1661¹ moved to a new theatre in Portugal Row on the south side of Lincoln's Inn Fields. Here Davenant introduced some important innovations, such as the regular use of movable scenery.² The new theatre was called the "Opera," probably on account of Davenant's reputation for musical dramas. It was at this "Opera" in Lincoln's Inn Fields that "Pompey the Great" was produced, and it was here that Mr. Samuel Pepys, Clerk of the Acts to the Admiralty, caught his first glimpse of Sir Charles Sedley. Already, on 1 July, 1663, he had heard with pious horror (not perhaps unmingled with prurient pleasure) from his friend Mr. Batten "of the late triall of Sir Charles Sidley" and of the scandalous proceedings in Bow Street. Since then, doubtless, he eagerly awaited an opportunity of seeing the hero of that episode in the flesh, and when, on the afternoon of 4 October, 1664,³ he found himself sitting next to 1664 the famous Wit at the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, we can well imagine that he strained his ears to catch

¹ Pepys's Diary, ed. Wheatley, I. 173.

² Downes's "Roscius Anglicanus" (8vo, 1708), p. 1; Lowe's "Life of Betterton" (1886), p. 62.

¹ Pepys's Diary, ed. Wheatley, II. 62, s.d. 2 June, 1661. "Home . . . and went to Sir William Davenant's Opera, this being the fourth day it hath begun."

² Cf. Lowe's "Life of Betterton," p. 73.

³ Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), IV. 258.

1664 all the wicked (but delightful) things which were likely to fall from his lips. It is possible to picture the malodorous, dark little theatre, lit only by candles guttering from chandeliers that hung from the roof,¹ with its stage still jutting well forward into the auditorium, and beneath it on the green-covered benches² of the pit, Sir Charles Sedley and his friends in rich suits, with swords and lace ruffles and huge flaxen periwigs which they occasionally "careen" with a pocket-comb. Doubtless they are well warmed by the good wines of the Rose or Locket's, and make a great hubbub, talking, laughing and fooling with the orange-girls, whose usual station is in this part of the house.³ Pepys, also handsomely dressed, with a middle-class precision that contrasts with the easy negligence of his aristocratic neighbours, listens cautiously, treasuring up the pearls of their wit to retail to his gossips. On the stage a riming "heroic" play by Lord Orrery is in progress. Pepys, however, pays less attention to the actors than to Sir Charles's criticisms, which he says were those of "a very witty man," Sedley taking "notice of the dullness of the poet and the badness of the action, and that most pertinently." The effect of such remarks, made in a perfectly audible voice, must have been more than a little disconcerting to the actors.⁴ Unfortunately, Pepys has recorded only

¹ Lowe's "Life of Betterton," p. 54.

² Misson's "Mémoires et Observations," p. 64. "La Parterre est en Amphitheatre, rempli de bancs sans dossiers, garnis et couverts d'une étoffe verte."

³ "Several young Coxcombs fool with the Orange-Women." Stage direction in the playhouse scene in Shadwell's "A True Widow" (4to, 1679), Act IV. p. 49.

⁴ Cf. with this incident the following speech of Sparkish, Wycherley's fop in "The Country Wife": "Gad, I go to a Play as to a Country-treat; I carry my own wine to one, and my own wit to t'other, or else I'm sure I shou'd not be merry at either; And the reason why we are so often louder than the Players is, because we think we speak more wit, one of Sir Charles's observations, which was provoked ¹⁶⁶⁴ by a situation of the kind 'which were so dear to "heroic" dramatists. An ardent lover resolves to rescue his rival and then surrender his mistress to him :

"He save my Rivall and make her confesse
That I deserve while he do but possesse,"¹ declaims Betterton in the part of the magnanimous Clorimon on the stage. "Why what Pox," breaks in Sir Charles's voice from the pit, "would he have him have more, or what is there to be had more of a woman than the possessing her?" This outburst and so become the Poet's Rivals in his audience." ("The Country Wife," 4to, 1675, III. ii. p. 38.)

¹ This play was not published till 1702 (4to), when it appeared under the name of "Altemira, A Tragedy," having apparently been recently revived. Pepys incorrectly says that the lines which provoked Sedley's contempt are spoken by "Lucidor" (in the printed edition "Lycidor"). Actually (unless Orrery altered the names of the characters) they occur in a speech of Clorimon in Act III. The situation is as follows: Lycidor, a rebel general, having been captured, has been sentenced to death. Clorimon, the general who has captured him, is in love with Altemira, Lycidor's mistress. She intercedes with the conqueror for her lover, and Clorimon resolves to obtain a reprieve from the King. The lines in the 1702 edition are slightly different from Pepys's version. They run as follows:

"I'll save my Rival, and make her Confess
'Tis I Deserve what he does but Possess."

The part of Clorimon was taken by Betterton, according to the cast printed in the 1702 edition, which probably refers to the original production. It is curious to notice that the play incurred the displeasure of the Wits, for it contains what seems a kind of clumsy attempt to win their approval. In the midst of a very "heroic" atmosphere of Love and War, we are shown in Act II. a drinking scene in "a Sutler's Tent," where various gallants toast their mistresses in a cynical strain which contrasts strangely with the magnanimous sentiments expressed in the speeches of the chief characters. It should be mentioned that "Altemira" was, according to the introduction to the 1702 edition (signed by Francis Manning), left unfinished by Orrery at his death and revised by "a Gentleman, who is universally esteemed an Ornament to Learning."

1664 scarcely seems to us to merit the epithet "witty," but it is a natural enough protest of flesh, blood and common sense against the dehumanised absurdities of the "heroic" style. It represents fairly accurately the almost aggressive reaction of the Wits against the idealism of the pre-Commonwealth theatre, of which the "heroic" dramas were a belated and exaggerated expression.

1663 In May 1663, about a month before Sedley's oration at the Cock, the King's company, under the command of Tom Killigrew, had, like their rivals, changed the scene of their operations. Leaving the old Salisbury Court (or Whitefriars) theatre, they were now installed in a fine new house in Drury Lane.¹ Here, for the first time apparently, the orchestra was placed in something like its modern position in front of and below the stage. Associated with Killigrew, and probably to a large extent financing his enterprise, was the well-known busybody, poetaster and would-be Admirable Crichton, Sir Robert Howard, and it may well have been through Killigrew, who was connected by marriage with the Sedleys, that Sir Charles made the acquaintance of Howard's brother-in-law, John Dryden, who had now for some time been writing plays for the King's company. About this time the great poet was courting the society of the Wits with the object of gaining something of the easy grace of their conversational style,² and it is not improbable

¹ See Lowe's "Life of Betterton" (1891), p. 100; Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), II. 115 (s.d. 8 May, 1663).

² Cf. "Satyr to his Muse." By the Author of "Absolom and Achitophel." London, 1682, pp. 1 and 2:

"I from that Fatal hour new hopes Pursu'd,
Set up for Wit and Aukwardly was Lewd, Drunk 'gainst my Stomack, 'gainst my Conscience Swore";

also Rochester's "Allusion to Horace" (Antwerpen, ed. p. 42):

"D—— in vain tried this nice way of wit,
For he to be a taring Blade thought fit."

that he first met Sedley behind the scenes at Killigrew's theatre. Our first definite knowledge of their acquaintance is, however, dated from a river excursion in which they both took part in the summer of 1665,¹⁶⁶⁵ and which was to be immortalised by Dryden in the noblest prose work of the age.¹ It was a fine afternoon in that terrible sultry June when the Plague was at its height in London, and in every street houses were to be seen with the "tragical mark" of the red cross indicating that they contained infected persons. This national calamity was complicated by a naval war with Holland, and during the day news had circulated that the fleet under the Duke of York had sailed out to give battle to the Dutch Admiral. The fashionable taverns and coffee-houses were emptied of their usual after-dinner occupants, who had heard the rumbling of distant cannon, and sallied forth in what they imagined to be the direction of the bombardment, in order to get an inkling of the result of the battle which was probably being fought at no great distance from the mouth of the Thames. Among these adventurous spirits were four gentlemen who had perhaps dined together at the Rose. Two were young sparks in the twenties, dressed in the height of fashion, the third a rather older man with an officious, bustling air, and the fourth a plainly-dressed person about thirty years of age and very deferential to his companions. They were the Lord Buckhurst, Sir Charles Sedley, Sir Robert Howard and Mr. John Dryden. Taking a barge, provided by one of Sedley's servants, they shot the rapids under old London Bridge with its houses and

¹ Dryden's "Essay of Dramatick Poesie" (4to, 1668). The present writer considers that it bears all the marks of being founded on reminiscences of real events. The identification of the four interlocutors, Eugenius, Lisideius, Crites and Neander, was originally made by Malone in his edition of Dryden's Prose Works (1800), and has since then been generally accepted.

1665 towers, where the heads of the regicides were still decaying on their pikes, and were rowed down-stream towards Greenwich through the crowded shipping which fear of the Dutch fleet had drawn into the Thames. When they arrived at the lower reaches, at that date bordered by trees and fields, they told the watermen to row softly, and strained their ears to catch the sound of the guns, which they heard "like the noise of distant thunder or like swallows in a chimney." Before long they noticed that the sound was receding from them, and Buckhurst, breaking the silence, congratulated his companions on what he considered to be "a happy omen of the nation's victory." In the course of the conversation which followed, Howard made a joking reference to the numerous bad panegyrics which would be called forth by a victory and the host of equally bad elegies which would fill the book-shops if the Duke should be killed. Hence arose, by an easy transition, a discussion of the question of the merits of contemporary poets compared on the one hand with "the ancients," and on the other with the men of "the last age" (or the period preceding the Civil War). Buckhurst championed the moderns, while Howard, to whom the part of a laudator temporis acti was congenial, undertook the defence both of the classics and of the older English writers. Sir Robert suggested that the comparison should be limited to the drama, and Buckhurst consented, with the reservation that, while he was convinced that the English drama is superior to that of the ancients, he considered the plays of the last age (that of Shakespeare, of Jonson) far superior to the drama of the Restoration. The latter judgment seems commonplace enough now but was sufficiently bold and original in 1665. Buckhurst consoled himself for the inferiority of the contemporary theatre with the thought that "in the epic or lyric way" the older English writers were being easily out-distanced by the poets of the reign of Charles II, ¹⁶⁶⁵ and in support of this view (which with regard to the "epic way" was more accurate than he imagined),¹ cited the names of Suckling, the idol of the Wits (who surely belonged to "the last age"), of Waller and of Denham. The company agreed that the discussion could not proceed further till an adequate definition of a good play were forthcoming, and they paid Sedley the compliment of asking him to provide such a definition. After some "modest denials" he gave what he called "a rude notion": "A just and lively image of human nature representing its passions and humours for the delight and instruction of mankind."

This definition, which, despite its slightly too general character, still seems excellent,² was adopted by the whole company, and, after they had told the watermen to turn the barge and row softly back through the cool of the evening, Howard and Buckhurst began an argument in which the former rather pompously defended "insolent Greece and haughty Rome," while the latter wittily pointed out the weakness of the ancient drama,³ dwelling especially on its inability to treat the subject of love. When this dispute had been ended by general consent in Buckhurst's favour, Sedley and Dryden took up the cudgels—this time on behalf of the respective claims of the English and French theatres. Sedley made out a strong case for the latter, laying special stress on the neatness of the French stage-craft, and acutely analysing some of the obvious weaknesses of the romantic drama. At the same time he referred in terms of warm admiration to Beaumont

¹ "Paradise Lost" did not appear till 1667, and Milton was almost unknown as a poet in 1665.

² It might serve equally for the ideal novel, but critics of the Restoration nearly always thought in terms of the stage.

³ Which, it must be remembered, was mainly known to the speakers through Seneca and the Latin comedians.

1665 and Fletcher and Ben Jonson. It is interesting also to find him citing the "Eunuch of Terence," a play which more than twenty years later he was to adapt brilliantly for the English stage. Dryden's reply was an eloquent but moderate defence of the English tradition, concluding with magnificent "characters" of Shakespeare, Jonson, and Beaumont and Fletcher, and an "examen" or analysis of the "Silent Woman." The rest of the evening was occupied by a hot dispute between Dryden and Howard, who, true to his character of a Sir Positive Atall, could not long remain silent. The subject was the vexed question of the comparative merits of blank verse and riming couplets as a vehicle of dramatic expression. During this discussion it is permissible to imagine that the attention of the two younger members of the company wandered. Perhaps their conversation turned on the reigning beauties of Whitehall and Drury Lane or some equally unacademic subject. When the barge had reached Somerset Stairs, Buckhurst had to call several times to the poets, who were so absorbed that they did not notice that they had reached their destination. The four friends, unwilling to separate, stood and gazed awhile at the river, which the full moon was flooding with light. Then, passing through a crowd of French refugees who were merrily dancing in the open air, they walked across the Strand to the Piazza of Covent Garden, whence Dryden and Howard repaired to their lodgings and Sedley and Buckhurst to "some pleasant appointment," probably at the Rose or the Cock.

For many years after this meeting, Dryden apparently continued to be intimate with Sir Charles Sedley. In 1673 he published a record of their friendship¹ which forms a significant contrast to the scene in Bow Street. He compares Sir Charles to Tibullus for his

¹ Dedication of "The Assignation, or Love in a Nunnery," to "My Most Honour'd Friend Sir Charles Sedley, Baronet" (4to, 1673).

"Candour, his Wealth" and "his way of Living," and ¹⁶⁶⁵ applies to him the beautiful lines which Horace addressed to that amiable Roman knight. After praising the "innocent and inoffensive Pleasure," the "eruditam voluptatem" of the ancient poets, he describes his meetings with Sedley and the other Wits as follows :

"We have, like them, our Genial Nights; where our discourse is neither too serious, nor too light; but always pleasant, and for the most part instructive : the raillery neither too sharp upon the present, nor too censorious on the absent; and the Cups only such as will raise the Conversation of the Night, without disturbing the business of the Morrow." These frugal and polite banquets, where the talk was doubtless of Shakespeare and Corneille, of Terence and of Horace, surely deserve to be remembered as much as the debauches which Sir Charles Sedley's biographers have described in so much detail. Dryden, protesting against contemporary scandal-mongers, seems to anticipate the "ignorant and ridiculous Descriptions" of a later age. "Such Wits as they describe," he continues to Sedley, "I have never been so unfortunate to meet in your Company : but have often heard much better Reasoning at your Table than I have encounter'd in their Books. The Wits, they describe, are the Fops we banish: for Blasphemy and Atheism, if they were neither Sin nor Ill Manners, are Subjects so very common and worn so Thredbare that people who have sence avoid them for fear of being suspected to have none."

According to a curious but by no means improbable story, Dryden owed to the Wits something more important than the graceful conversational style which he admired so much. If this tradition be true, it was actually the friends of Nell Gwynne and Old Rowley, who first showed "Paradise Lost" to the future author

1665 of "Absalom and Achitophel." The tale is told as follows by Jonathan Richardson, the eighteenth-century painter and critic — "Dr. T. Robinson told me that it was my L. Dorset that made P. Lost first taken notice of: that he light upon it by Chance in Little Brittain, & reading a few lines was so pleas'd with it that he bought it for a Trifle, for it was then but waste Paper & when He came home read it many times over, & sent it to Dryden to know his opinion of it. Dryden had never seen it before, but brought it back to Him, & told Him that Poet had cutt us all out. This was y^e 4th Ed. & ab^t 2 years after y^e first Publication of y^e work. & My L^d Dorset told it himself to D^r Robinson at that Time at y^e Grecian Coffee House."¹ Dr. Tancred Robinson was an elderly London physician in 1734, when Richardson's book was published. The story, which Dorset told him at the Grecian Coffee House, a great haunt of men of letters in the reigns of William III and Anne, has the ring of truth. Masson, in his "Life of Milton," imagines Buckhurst and Sedley visiting the blind old republican at his house in Bunhill Fields. It is pleasant to picture such a meeting between the courtiers and the Puritan. It would be still pleasanter to know that the conversation of his visitors convinced Milton that good manners and polite learning were not confined to the seriousminded, and that the "Sons of Belial," besides 1665 indulging in

¹ MS. note by Jonathan Richardson on p. cxix of annotated copy of "Remarks on Milton's Paradise Lost by J. Richardson Father and Son," London, 8vo, 1734, in the London Library. In the printed text Richardson states that the story was told to Robinson by "Fleet Shephard," i.e. Fleetwood Shepherd, the friend of Dorset and Sedley, but he prefixes to the MS. note the words: "This is a former account that I wrote down as soon as I came home," so it would seem that the account given in the note is more likely to be the true one. In the printed text the version of Dryden's remark is as follows: "This Man (says Dryden) Cuts us All Out and the Ancients too." The "L^d Dorset" of Richardson's note was, of course, the later title of Lord Buckhurst. I am allowed to reproduce Richardson's MS. note by kind permission of the Librarian of the London Library.

"Court Amours, Mixt dance or wanton Mask or Midnight Bal," also found time to read the best ancient and modern authors and were as capable of appreciating great poetry as his friends, Andrew Marvell and Cyriack Skinner.

CHAPTER V

TRAVEL, FRIENDSHIPS AND THE DRAMA

"Sidley indeed and Rochester might write
For their own credit and their friends delight,
Showing how farr they cou'd ye rest outdoe
As in their fortunes, so their writings too."

Stowe MSS. 969, f. 67.

"Sidley indeed may be content with Fame,
Nor care should an ill-judging Audience damn:
But Settle, and the Rest, that write for Pence,
Whose whole Estate's an ounce, or two of Brains,
Should a thin House on the third day appear,
Must starve, or live in Tatters all the year."

Oldham: "A Satyr" (Works, 1694, p. 175).

"But let no alien S-dl-y interpose
To lard with wit thy hungry Epsom prose."

Dryden (To Shadwell) in "MacFlecknoe" (1682).

"There go divers with him, but especially the Lord Buckhurst and Sir Ch. Sidly, who will lead the muses and the graces such a dance as may instruct and civilise fair France."—Mr. Henshaw to Sir R. Paston, July 16, 1670 (Hist. MSS. Comm., 6th Report, Appendix, p. 367).

WHEN Dryden's Melantha cried, "How charming is the French ayr! and what an étourdy bête is one of our untravel'd Islanders,"¹ she was only expressing the general opinion of the Restoration Court. There were several causes for the attraction towards France felt by young Englishmen of quality in the later decades of the seventeenth century, which was, in some ways, not unlike the "anglomanie" of the young French aristocrats of a later age. The King had not only passed much of his youth in France, but was half-French by descent and especially attached to his French relatives. Many of the exiled Cavaliers had spent years in Paris and other French towns during "the late troubles," and, after the Restoration, many Frenchmen, banished for religious or political reasons, came to live in England. This increased intercourse between the two nations coincided exactly with a time when the Latin element in the English character was asserting itself more strongly than ever before. Nowhere is this fact more clearly reflected than in the literature of the age. Obscure magnificence and "the fairy way of writing," which may be supposed to represent the Teutonic and Celtic strains in the English blood, disappear almost entirely for a while, and, in their place, alike in verse and prose, Roman logic and good sense reign supreme. The men who were reading and writing verse like Dryden's and prose like Locke's were in a peculiarly favourable position to appreciate the qualities of the countrymen of Racine and Pascal. Finally, the French nation was really at this time entering into one of the most remarkable phases in its history, and it was perfectly natural that Englishmen should feel a keen interest in that monarchy of Louis XIV which, with all its faults, was in many ways the most civilised institution in Europe. The relations of the Wits (who represent the intellectual element in the English aristocracy of the period) with France are therefore of very great interest to the student of literary and social history. That they all visited France and were influenced by French life and literature is a commonplace of the text-books. The actual details of this connection are not, however, so well known.

¹ "Marriage à la Mode," II. i. (4to, 1673, p. 16).

Sedley, as we have seen, probably visited Paris at the age of seven. There is no record of his having crossed the Channel again till 25 November, 1665, ¹⁶⁶⁵ on which date a laconic minute among the State Papers informs us of the granting of a "Pass for Sir Charles 1665 Sydley Bt. into france."¹ That bare statement is the only trace of this journey that survives, but it is possible to build some fascinating conjectures upon it. A man of twenty-six, with a natural bent towards Latin culture, must have been profoundly influenced by a near view of a society which had attained to a degree of external splendour and intellectual eminence capable of dazzling the most prejudiced Briton. The Paris that Sir Charles Sedley visited in 1665—it may be assumed that he went to the capital—was the city of Louis XIV, of Madame de Sévigné, of Madame de Lafayette, of Bussy de Rabutin, of Corneille in his decline, of Molière at the zenith of his glory, of Racine in the flush of his first success. "Alexandre," the second tragedy of the last author, was produced at the Hôtel de Bourgogne on 4 December, 1665, before a brilliant audience, which included the King's brother, the Duke of Orléans, and his wife, "Madame Henriette d'Angleterre," the favourite sister of Charles II. If Sedley left England on 25 November (the date on which his pass was granted), he may easily have arrived in Paris in time for this performance. It is probable that he hastened to pay his respects to "Madame," who was the protectress of the English in Paris, and to whom he may have been presented when she visited her brother at Whitehall in 1661. He may have attended the State performance of "Alexandre" in her train, and it is pleasant to imagine him comparing the theatre of Molière with Drury Lane and Lincoln's Inn Fields, and noting details of foreign stage-craft for the benefit of his friends, Tom Killigrew and Sir William Davenant. On the eve of Twelfth Night, 1666, the Duke and Duchess of Orléans gave a magnificent entertainment at the Palais Royal. Among the guests was le Roi Soleil himself, who is said to have been dressed in a suit of violet cloth covered with pearls and diamonds. The King was received "in the great gallery filled with dazzling lights which were reflected in numerous 1665 mirrors, a great luxury at that 'period,' and we are told that one of the objects of this display was to impress "several foreigners who were in Paris at that time and before whom the King was pleased to exhibit the magnificence of his Court."¹ It is highly probable that these "foreigners" included a group of Charles II's courtiers, and among them Sir Charles Sedley. Part of the entertainment consisted of a performance of Molière's "Le Médecin Malgré Lui" by the author's troupe, who were now the King's comedians, and Sedley, if he was present, must have envied a Court that could command the services of such a dramatist.

¹ Cal. State Papers Dom., Chas. II. Ent. Book XXII. p. 316.

War was declared between England and France on 1 February, 1665, but it was a very half-hearted affair, at any rate so far as the Governments of the two countries were concerned. The French King allowed English subjects who were in France at the time to stay on for three months after the declaration of war, and Lord Hollis, our Ambassador in Paris, was permitted to remain. No doubt this decree was generously interpreted, and it is not impossible that Sedley was still in Paris in June 1666, when he may have had the honour of assisting at the "première" 1666 of the greatest of all French comedies, "Le Misanthrope."

By February 1666/7 Sir Charles was certainly back in England, for on the 18th of that month Pepys 1666/67 saw him at the theatre²—this time at a performance of "The Maid's Tragedy" at the King's House in Drury Lane. Apparently the diarist was again sitting close to the Baronet, for he was "vexed all the while" by his conversation with "two talking ladies," "he (Sir Charles) being a stranger." In spite of the fact that

¹ "Henriette Anne d'Angleterre par le Comte de Baillon," Paris, 1886, pp. 254-5.

² Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), VI. pp. 185, 186.

1666/67 he could not hear much of the play, Pepys has to admit that he was "pleased to hear their discourse," which, to judge from his description, must have been very amusing. One of the ladies kept her mask on "all the play," and "being exceedingly witty as ever I heard woman, did talk most pleasantly with him, but was, I believe, a virtuous woman and of quality."¹ Sedley tried to discover the identity of the fair unknown, but she refused to tell him her name, "yet did give him many pleasing hints of her knowledge of him, by that means setting his brains at work to find out who she was, and did give him leave to use all means to find out who she was, but pulling off her mask. He was mighty witty and she also making sport with him very inoffensively, that a more pleasant rencontre I never heard." The "pleasant rencontre" probably prevented many people besides Pepys from hearing the actors, but they were occasionally reminded that a play was in progress by "Sir Charles Sedley's exceptions against the words and pronouncing," which Pepys considered "very pretty." It is not unlikely that some verses included in the collected editions of Sedley's works (but first printed anonymously in 1672),² under the title, "On falling in Love with a Stranger at the Play," are connected with this episode. It would certainly have been an exquisite sequel to the "rencontre" for the masked beauty to have received the next morning a copy of verses beginning:

"Fair Amarallis on the Stage whil'st you
Beheld a feigned love, you gave a true;
I like a Coward in the Amorous War,
Came only to look on, yet got a Scar. . . ."

¹ Prof. Allardyce Nicoll, in his "Restoration Drama" (p. 15), says that these ladies were "of doubtful propriety even though Pepys tends to believe they are virtuous and of quality." I cannot see why he should cast any doubt on Pepys's statement.

² "A Collection of Poems," printed for Hobert Kemp, 1672 (Pt. II. p. 1).

In the same year (1667) Sedley seems to have been 1667 intimate with a lady who was less cultivated than her Grace of Richmond, but probably her superior in wit and beauty. Pretty Nell Gwynne, the incarnation of the free Bohemian spirit, had for some time been delighting the patrons of the King's House by her piquant acting. Sprung from the dregs of the population and brought up, by her own admission, in a brothel,¹ this astonishing girl succeeded not only in becoming a brilliant comic actress at the theatre, where she started her career by selling oranges in the pit, but also in captivating one of the most gifted young noblemen in England. Exactly when Lord Buckhurst succeeded the actor, Charles Hart, as her acknowledged lover is unknown, but we can be pretty sure that his lordship was often accompanied by his bosom friend, Sir Charles Sedley, in his visits to Nelly's lodgings in Drury Lane.² On 13 July, 1667,³ Pepys heard from Mr. Pierce that Lord Buckhurst "hath got Nell away from the King's House . . . and gives her a £100 a year, so she hath sent her part to the house and will act no more." The next day (Sunday, 14 July) Pepys⁴ took his wife by coach to Epsom Wells and thence to Epsom village, where they bespoke dinner at the King's Head. There, apparently from local gossip, they heard that Lord Buckhurst, Nelly, and Sir Charles Sedley were lodging next door, where they "keep merry house." "Poor girl, I pity her, but more the loss of her at the King's House," adds the diarist with a quaint mixture of cant and ingenuousness. The place where the trio lodged is said by local tradition to have been a two-storied building with bow-windows which still stands next door to the King's Head Inn.⁵ With Sedley's wit and Nelly's

¹ Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), VII. 172.

² Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley).

³ Ibid., VII. 20.

⁴ Ibid., p. 22.

⁵ It is now the "Nell Gwynne Restaurant." The interior has been entirely modernised.

1667 laughter, and abundance of good wine, the evenings must have passed merrily, while plenty of diversion was doubtless provided during the daytime by the "sprucer sort of citizens," the Fribbles and Biskets of Shadwell's comedy, who brought their wives to drink the waters and were eased of their guineas by the swarms of London sharps and bullies who haunted the place. One afternoon Sir Charles deserted his friends for more respectable company. On 5 August, 1667, he appears to have ridden over to the Durdans, Lord Berkely's fine country seat, about a mile from Epsom. Among the guests was a pious old lady, Mary Rich, Countess of Warwick. Sir Charles seems to have behaved in a perfectly decent manner, but the Countess, who had perhaps heard of the Bow Street sermon, was in an agony of apprehension lest the very air breathed by such a monster should sully her purity. The entry in her diary¹ which records her meeting with Sir Charles is worthy of quotation:

Aug. 5, 1667.—Went with Lady Robartes and her lord to Durdans to see my lord who was there. At dinner that day dined Sir Henry [sic] Sedley,² which was much trouble for me to see him lest he should be profane. But it pleased God to restrain him; yet the knowledge I had how profane a person he is much troubled me to be in his company. . . .

It is unfortunate that we cannot supplement this note with the description of the Countess that Sir Charles

¹ Printed in "Mary Rich, Countess of Warwick," by Charlotte Fell-Smith (London, 1901), p. 195.

² Obviously a slip for "Sir Charles," as Miss Fell-Smith points out in a footnote, where she comments on the diversity between Sir Charles's temperament and that of Lady Warwick, but does not cite the passage from Pepys which proves that Sedley was in Epsom in July, and which conclusively identifies Lady Warwick's "Sir Henry" with Sir Charles. She also states incorrectly that the real Sir Henry died in 1656 (see p. 29).

Sedley probably gave to Nelly and Buckhurst on his 1667 return to the "merry house." That Sedley's reputation for profanity and general wickedness was widely established about this time, even among less saintly persons than Lady Warwick, is shown by two chance allusions in Pepys's Diary. On 2 July, 1667,¹ Pepys's cousin, Roger, told him an astounding and altogether incredible piece of scandal concerning Archbishop Sheldon, the narrow, haughty, but virtuous and upright Primate of England. There is not a shadow of doubt that it is the mere gossip of persons who "hate to acknowledge that others are better than themselves,"² but it is interesting to find that Sedley is selected as a suitable hero for the tale. "My cozen Roger told us as a thing certain that the Archbishop of Canterbury that now is do keep a wench, and that he is as very a wencher as can be; and tells us that it is publicly known that Sir Charles Sidley had got away one of the Archbishop's wenches from him, and the Archbishop sent to him to let him know that she was his kinswoman, and did wonder that he should offer any dishonour to one related to him. To which Sir Charles Sidley is said to answer: 'a Pox take his Grace! pray tell his Grace that I believe he finds himself too old and is afraid I shall outdo him among his girls and spoil his trade.' But he makes no doubt that the Archbishop is a wencher and known to be so, which is one of the most astonishing things I have heard of."

Again, on 16 November, Mr. Gregory, wishing to give Pepys a thoroughly bad character of Lord Vaughan, told him that he was "one of the lewdest fellows of the age, worse than Sir Charles Sidley."³ Perhaps the character of the Wicked Baronet, so dear to the imagination of the British public in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, originated in these

¹ Diary (ed. Wheatley), VII. 48.

² The phrase is from Wheatley's footnote.

³ Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), VII. 199.

1667 times, and its prototype may have been none other than Sir Charles.

The news that the Dutch fleet was in the Medway on 23 July, 1667, probably did not disturb the merry party at Epsom. As Sedley was still there in August, it does not seem as if his duties as an officer in the Kentish militia weighed very heavily on him, even when there was an imminent danger of invasion. He was probably occupied with the more serious business of writing a comedy. The gossips of the London theatres were discussing this work in January 1667/8. On the 11th of that month, Pepys heard of it from his friend Mrs. Knipp or Knepp, a popular actress at the King's House, where she was a colleague of Nelly.¹ She told him that the title of Sedley's play was "The Wandering Ladys," that it was shortly coming upon the stage, and that it "will be most pleasant." There can be no doubt that Mrs. Knipp was referring to the play which was afterwards called "The Mulberry Garden." The subject of "Wandering Ladys" seems to have been very popular among dramatists about this time. Perhaps it was suggested by the bold frolics of the Maids of Honour, who, imitating the Court gallants, had sometimes sallied forth from Whitehall in disguise.² George Etherege, Sedley's friend, was probably at work on a comedy on a very similar theme at this very time, and it can hardly be doubted that there was some kind of friendly rivalry between the two Wits. In spite of Gentle George's proverbial laziness, on this occasion he was first in the field, and his delightful play "She Wou'd if She Cou'd" was produced at the King's House on 6 February, 1667/8. Buckhurst and Sedley were in the pit with the author at the first performance,³ and they were accompanied by his Grace of Buckingham, who, 1667/68 only a fortnight before, had fought his notorious duel with the Earl of Shrewsbury at Barn Elms.

¹ She acted with Nelly in the "Maiden Queen," "Tyrannic Love," and other plays.

² Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), IV. 359, V. 324.

³ Ibid.

By 7 May preparations for the production of Sedley's play seem to have started in earnest. On that day Pepys called for his friend Mrs. Knipp, at the King's House in Drury Lane, and drove her to her lodgings, where Bannister, the musician, taught her the setting which he had composed for the exquisite song in Act III. of "The Mulberry Garden":

*"Ah, Cloris! that I now could sit
As unconcern'd as when . . ."*

We may infer from this circumstance that she was already cast for the part of Victoria. Bannister's tune has not survived, but it is interesting to know that Pepys dismissed it contemptuously as "a slight, silly, short ayre."¹ On 18 May the long-expected "Mulberry Garden," as it was finally christened, was at last produced at Drury Lane. Sedley's reputation for wit (and also for profanity) drew immense crowds to the King's play-house for the first performance. Pepys, in his anxiety to obtain a seat (there were no reserved places in those days), arrived at midday with three lady friends, and found the doors still closed. When the diarist and his friends were able to enter, they discovered "many people already come in by private ways to the pit." These were, doubtless, the dramatist's numerous acquaintances, who were provided with what is now called "paper."

The prospect of waiting dinnerless till the end of the play at five or six o'clock did not appeal to Pepys, so, having hired a boy to keep his place, he very ungallantly left the ladies and slipped out to the Rose, where he dined heartily off a breast of mutton. He returned in time to see the King and Queen come in "with all the Court; and the house infinitely full." Let us glance

¹ Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), VIII. 7.

1667/68 round the theatre on this momentous occasion. The stage, at present empty, runs well forward into the auditorium, covering part of the area corresponding to the position of the modern stalls. It has no footlights, and the only illumination is provided by wax candles in branches hanging from the roof. The floor of the house round three sides of the stage is occupied by the pit, and here on benches without backs loll a great crowd of Beaux and Wits in large flaxen periwigs¹ and rich suits, among whom can be recognised the author of the play, with his allies, Buckhurst, Etherege, Rochester, Savile, Fleetwood Shepherd and the Duke of Buckingham. In the pit too, with their backs to the stage, stand the Orange-girls, with their baskets of "Hesperian Fruit"² on their arms, under the command of their famous and very efficient leader, "Orange Moll."³ The first tier, corresponding to the modern dress circle, but probably much lower down and very close to the pit, is composed entirely of boxes. The largest is in the centre, and is at present occupied by the swarthy King, "Old Rowley" himself, with his black moustache and twinkling eyes. Beside him sits his much-wronged wife, the sallow Katherine of Braganza, with her Maids of Honour. The other boxes are filled chiefly with fashionable ladies, blazing with jewels. Among them, we may be certain, is the lovely Frances Stuart, now Duchess of Richmond and Lennox, to whom Sedley showed the play when "it was in loose sheets,"⁴ and to whom he dedicated it. The next gallery is occupied by less respectable ladies in vizard masks and tawdry finery with their bullies. Still higher, in the "gods," stand the lackeys in their brilliant liveries, who make nearly as much noise as

¹ "You men with bright rose-noble Hair": Davenant's Ballad Epilogue to "The Man's the Master" (4to, 1669).

² Rochester: "A Panegyrick on Nelly" (Works, 8vo, 1709, p. 100).

³ Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), VII. passim.

⁴ Dedication of "The Mulberry Garden" (4to, 1668).

their masters in the pit. After the orchestra, consisting of "nine or ten fiddles," sitting just below the stage, has executed a few ballad-tunes¹ the curtains are drawn and the long-expected comedy commences. In spite of Mrs. Knipp's vivacity, the audience does not warm to the play. None of the witticisms elicits a trace of a smile from the King, and we may be sure that most of the Court regulated their countenances by their master's. Perhaps the loyal Etherege and some of the other Wits attempted to applaud, but the general opinion of the house was undoubtedly expressed by Pepys, who considered that "though there was, here and there, a pretty saying, and that not very many neither, yet the whole of the play had nothing extraordinary in it at all, neither of language nor design."² The pooriness of the music, on which Pepys specially remarks, may have contributed to this cool reception. It is to be hoped that the poet consoled himself afterwards by entertaining his friends to a merry supper at the Rose. It is probable that subsequent performances were more successful, for "The Mulberry Garden" had what was considered a long run in those days. Pepys went to see it again on 20 May, but could not "be reconciled to it, but find only here and there an independent sentence of wit, and that is all." It was still being acted on 29 June, when Pepys went a third time, accompanied by his wife.³

If Sedley was disappointed at the reception of his first original play, he had the consolation of making a new and lifelong friend in this spring of 1668. Thomas Shadwell, a Norfolk gentleman with a coarse, jolly character and a great zest for life and literature, had probably been admitted to the circle that met at the Rose and Will's on the success of his brilliant social satire, "The Sullen Lovers," produced at the

¹ Lowe's "Life of Betterton," p. 27.

² For analysis and criticism of "The Mulberry Garden," see pp. 247-63.

³ Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), VIII. 58.

1667/68 Duke's house in May. Sedley seems to have been on specially intimate terms with Shadwell from the first.¹ The hearty and rather plebeian temperament of honest Tom must have provided a healthy antidote to the rather foppish and affected conversation of such companions as Etherege, and Sir Charles was doubtless drawn to him by the element of downright good sense and realism in his own character. There is abundant evidence that Sedley gave Shadwell considerable help in his writings, and the flashes of wit that lighten up the scenes of some of his best comedies are, no doubt, often due to the Baronet's pen.²

1668 Anthony à Wood's statement that, after the affair at the Cock Tavern, Sedley "took up and grew very serious" is, unfortunately, belied by the records of certain events which took place in the autumn of 1668, when the Wits indulged in some frolics that rivalled their escapades of 1663. Buckingham was now supreme at Court,³ and he and his friends, Sedley and Buckhurst, appear to have been constantly in the King's company. They went with his Majesty on a royal progress which he made through the eastern counties at the end of September.⁴ The party seem to have

¹ Cf. Shadwell's statement in the dedication of the "Tenth Satyr of Juvenal," etc. (8vo, 1687), to Sedley, that he had lived "from his youth" in Sir Charles's company.

² It may be as well to summarise some of this evidence. Firstly, Shadwell himself admits in the dedication of his "True Widow" to Sedley that the Baronet had given the play "the honour of his correction and alteration." Secondly, Dryden implies in a mordant couplet in "MacFlecknoe" that Sedley had a hand in "Epsom Wells":

"But let no alien S-dl-y interpose
To lard with wit thy hungry Epsom prose."

Thirdly, Oldys in his MS. Notes to Langbaine says, "I have heard that Dorset, Sedley and others of those idle Wits would write whole Scenes for him" (see Appendix I, p. 320).

³ "The Duke of Buckingham is now all in all": Pepys, 23 October, 1666 (Wheatley, VIII. 129).

⁴ Cal. State Papers Dom., Chas. II, Nov. 1667–Sept. 1668, pp. 600, 606.

visited the little town of Thetford in Norfolk, where 1668 Charles II conducted himself in a way which must have caused grave misgivings to Cavaliers of the old school, accustomed as they were by now to his Majesty's frailties. The King, Sedley and Buckhurst, having probably dined well together, sent for the fiddlers of the town, and made them "sing them all the bawdy songs they could think of," while the company, doubtless, joined in the choruses.¹ By 8 October the Court was at Saxham Parva, the beautiful seat of William, Baron Crofts, near Bury St. Edmunds, the "native sweets" of which had been daintily hymned by Carew many years before.

One night Lord Arlington, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, arrived with despatches for the King. The effects of an evening spent with Sedley and Buckhurst, however, seem to have been too much for his Majesty, and he was unable to see the Minister.² The next day the Duke of York reproved Bab May, the well-known courtier, who seems to have been one

¹ Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), VIII. 129. Pepys told the story on 23 October, but is obviously referring to events which had happened some time before. The Calendar of State Papers informs us that the King was going on a progress on 23 September, and on the 28th we learn from the same source that "the Court is removing to Audley End" (references in Note 4, p. 108). We may thus suppose that the visit to Thetford took place during this progress. The royal party were at Harwich on 3 October, and at Saxham near Bury on the 7th. From a letter from Captain Taylor to Pepys dated 8 October (summarised on p. 9 of Cal. State Papers Dom., Chas. II, 1668-9) it appears that the royal party included, besides Buckingham and his friends, the Earl of Oxford, the Duke of Monmouth and the Duke of York.

² Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), VIII. 130; see also Cal. State Papers Dom., Chas. II, 1668-9, p. 8, where a letter from Arlington from Bury stated that he "could not see the King at Saxham, nor until to-day, by reason of the uncertainty of his motions." Compare the words which I have italicised with Pepys's less courtly but probably truer explanation. ". . . the King was drunk at Saxham with Sidley and Buckhurst the night my Lord Arlington came thither, and would not give him audience or could not: which is true, for it was the night that I was there, and saw the King go up to his chamber and was told that the King had been drinking."

1668 of the prime movers of this debauch, and who, according to James, was the cause of "the King's giving himself up to these gentlemen, to the neglecting of Lord Arlington." Bab May's answer gives us a startling glimpse of the liberties which "Old Rowley" allowed his favourites: "By God, there was no man in England that had heads to lose durst do what they do, every day, with the King," which, as Pepys devoutly added, was "a sign of a mad world. God bless us out of it."

From Saxham the Court went to Audley End, the King's house near Newmarket, and Sedley, it may be supposed, was one of the party who hunted and attended race-meetings with the King during October. A letter from the Earl of Thomond shows how Charles II and his friends passed their time.

"The King is highly pleased with all his Newmarket recreations; up by candle-light this morning and yesterday morning hunting the hare; in the afternoon he hawks and courses with greyhounds; to Harwich to-morrow and Monday here again. The Cup will be ridden for next week before the Queen."¹

1668/69 Hard drinking and hard riding were the chief diversions at Newmarket that autumn, and the former did not, apparently, cease when the Court returned to Whitehall on 17 October.² Some time between that date and the 23rd, there occurred a kind of repetition of the Bow Street frolic.³ There does not seem to have been any speech-making on this occasion, but Sedley and Buckhurst again endeavoured to appear publicly in the "state of nature." They are said to have run up and down the streets in their shirts, to have fought the watch, and, finally, to have been beaten and "clapped up" by a constable. On this occasion Lord Chief Justice Keeling played a less manly part than his predecessor, Sir Robert Foster, and, apparently at the 1668/69 command of the King himself, instead of punishing the disturbers of the peace, he actually admonished and imprisoned the constable for daring to interfere with the pleasures of the royal favourites! If this account of the affair be true, Pepys was justified in his comment that "it was a horrid shame."

¹ Cal. State Papers Dom., Chas. II, 1668/9, p. 3.

² Ibid., p. 23.

³ Pepys heard this story with much other gossip from Mr. Pierce on 23 October, 1668. This is the only evidence on which it rests.

Early in the following year we hear of Sedley in connection with an incident which is hardly more creditable to him than the drunken frolics of 1663 and 1668, although on this occasion it must be admitted that he acted under a good deal of provocation. Like most of the tales in which he figures, the story of this affair is shrouded in a good deal of mystery,¹ but the following seem to have been roughly the facts. Edward Kynaston was a handsome young actor who originally belonged to Betterton's company, but who, after the issue of the patents to Killigrew and Davenant, was transferred to the King's house. He was especially noted for his success in female parts (which were still sometimes acted by youths after the Restoration), and was a great pet of the fine ladies, who used to drive him round the "tour" of Hyde Park in his stage

¹ The authorities are Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), VIII. 217; Oldys's Notes to Langbaine, No. (1) (see Appendix I, p. 318); Genest's "Some Account of the English Stage," I. 80, 81, 93. Genest connects the affair with the beating of Sir Samuel Forecast, who is mistaken for Sir John Everyoung on account of his fine clothes, in the "Mulberry Garden." "It was," he says, "perhaps meant by Sidley as a hint to Kynaston. Kynaston was, however, far from taking the hint and he seems to have proceeded to greater liberties with Sir Charles." Although there is no evidence for this except Genest's bare word, it is by no means improbable that Kynaston had been aping Sedley for some time, and that the poet either introduced the caning incident into his play as a warning to the actor, or else took a hint from it when he wanted to punish him. I see no reason to suppose (as Lord Braybrooke does in his note on the passage in Pepys) that the beating referred to by Oldys may have been different from that recorded by Pepys. Oldys merely says that the reason for the beating was that Kynaston dressed like Sedley; Pepys says that he acted a part in "The Heyresse" "in abuse" of Sir Charles. The divergence is not very great.

1668/69 clothes.¹ This young man bore a strong resemblance to Sedley, and did all he could to heighten it by dressing like him. He seems to have gone so far as to have appeared on the stage in clothes that exactly resembled those of Sir Charles, and to have acted a part which was intended to ridicule the Baronet in a play called "The Heyresse,"² by the Duke of Newcastle. After a performance of this piece, probably on the last day in January 1668/9, Kynaston was imprudent enough to take a stroll in St. James's Park in the "laced clothes" in which he had impersonated Sedley on the stage. An insult of this kind was not to be borne lightly by a Restoration gentleman. Sedley replied, as any other man of his class and age would have done, by having recourse to what Rochester called "Black Will and a cudgel." His manner of administering chastisement was not, however, without humour. He hired a ruffian³ whom he ordered to waylay Kynaston in the Park, pretend to mistake him for Sedley, by whom he was to feign to have been insulted, and to give the unfortunate actor a sound thrashing. Sedley's emissary carried out his instructions so thoroughly that poor Kynaston was unable to appear at Drury Lane the next day, being "mightily bruised, and forced to keep his bed." On the 2nd he was still too indisposed to appear on the stage, and Pepys heard his colleague, Beeston, read his part. According to Pepys, the King, who always took a keen interest in his "servants," was exceedingly angry with Sedley, but the latter is said to have disclaimed all knowledge of the affair. By 9 February, Kynaston was well enough to appear in Fletcher's "Island Princess," and was probably cured for ever of masquerading as a baronet.⁴

¹ See Cibber's "Apology," ed. Lowe, I. 119-21.

² No play of this name by the Duke of Newcastle has survived. It may be remarked that the word "Heir" was formerly used for "Heiress," and this was the title of a play by Thomas May (1620).

³ Pepys says "two or three."

⁴ Pepys, VIII. 223.

In 1670 Sedley seems to have paid another visit ¹⁶⁷⁰ to Louis XIV's Court, under more magnificent circumstances than those of 1665. In April, Madame Henriette was sent by her brother-in-law, the French King, to negotiate a secret treaty with Charles II. The whole Court (including the Duke's company of players) went down to Dover to meet her, and Charles II, with that boyish impetuosity which was one of his most attractive qualities, sailed out in an open boat to welcome his beloved sister at sea. We may be sure that Sedley was among the courtiers who dazzled the worthy citizens of Dover and Canterbury (whither the Court removed after Madame's arrival) for a few weeks. The entertainments provided for the fair ambassadress included a performance of "The Sullen Lovers," the comedy of Sedley's friend, Tom Shadwell, which is said to have delighted "Madame."¹

The death of Henriette on 30 June, shortly after her return to France, gave rise to the usual stories of poison, which followed the death of every celebrated person in those days. Charles II betrayed more genuine feeling on this occasion than he had perhaps ever shown in his life, and Louis, in order to clear himself from all suspicions, ordered a post-mortem examination to be made. He also hastened to send the Maréchal de Bellefonds, one of his most distinguished courtiers, on an embassy of condolence to the Court of St. James. The Duke of Buckingham, probably at his own request, was selected as the chief of an English mission, the ostensible object of which was merely to repay the compliments conveyed by de Bellefonds. Buckingham was, however, secretly empowered to conclude the famous "traité simulé" by which Louis and Charles deceived the Duke and the party in England which, though stoutly Protestant and constitutional, was not averse from an alliance with France. This mock

¹ Downe's "Roscius Anglicanus" (8vo, 1708), p. 29.

1670 treaty was a version of the secret pact concluded between Charles II and Madame at Dover, from which the most offensive clauses (such as that by which Charles agreed to declare himself a "Papist") were omitted. Buckingham, in spite of some opposition from the Duke of York,¹ set out about 20 July,² accompanied by Buckhurst, Sedley and a small train "without anything of greatnes." The rest of the party, which included Samuel Butler, the witty author of "Hudibras," Dr. Sprat, that mercurial divine who collaborated with Buckingham in "The Rehearsal," and Joe Haines, the famous comic actor, followed at a short distance. Never perhaps before or since has such an amazing diplomatic mission left the shores of this country.

Louis XIV gave them a magnificent reception. An apartment in the Palace of St. Germain-en-Laye was set aside for the Duke, and a table was provided for him at the King's expense, "furnished with the same

¹ "Correspondance d'Angleterre" (Quai d'Orsay Archives), tom. 98, f. 76. Colbert writes on 20 July, "Le Voyage du Duc du Bouquinkam est resolu. Mr. le Duc d'York fait neansmoins encore ce qu'il peut pour l'empescher."

² Hist. MSS. Comm., 5th Report, Appendix I, p. 652. Sir A. Fraser, to Lord High Commissioner of Scotland: "Whythall 23 July [1670]. . . . The Duk of Buggingham, with the Lord Buckhurst, Sir Ch. Sidley, Mr. Stanly, James Porter, and 4 seruants sets out Moonday at night, without traine, coach or anything of greatnes: his abood fortnight only. They discourse variously of his journy and because I know not, I will say nothing of it." Cf. Colbert writing of 24 July (tom. 98, f. 80): "Je pourray vous rendre compte beaucoup plus tost que le Duc de Bouquinkam n'arrivera a Paris." This implies that Buckingham had already gone by the 24th and confirms Fraser's statement. The Embassy had been planned as early as the 16th, when it was already decided that Buckhurst and Sedley should accompany the Duke: Hist. MSS. Comm. 6th Report, Appendix, p. 367. Mr. Henshaw to Sir R. Paston, 16 July 1670: "The Duke of Buckingham is to go compliment the French King; there go divers with him, but especially the Lord Buckhurst and Sir Ch. Sidly, who will lead the muses and the graces such a dance as may instruct and civilise fair France. . . ."

dishes and the same quantity as his owne.”¹ On 16 1670 August the Englishmen were shown a review of what were considered the finest troops in Europe. On the 20th poor Madame, whom the French Court soon forgot, was solemnly buried at St. Denis, the sepulchre of the French kings. On the 23rd the whole party were superbly entertained at Versailles. The exquisite canal in the park (still one of the loveliest things in France) had then been newly sunk, and a Watteau-like mimic battle was arranged on the waters in honour of the visitors. A “great ship” was attacked by small boats “deckt with Pennants and Streamers,” one of which contained the King and Queen, while the others were “manned” by the beauties of the Court. There was much music from kettle-drums, trumpets and a band of violins, but “no firing because the ladies should not be discomposed.” It may easily be imagined that a man of Sedley’s tastes would thoroughly appreciate the charm of this entertainment, which seems to have embodied the spirit of French civilisation at one of its most wonderful moments. After the naval action, a light collation of “fruits and sweetmeats wth some fish” was served, and it must be added with regret that his Grace of Buckingham partook so lavishly of the fruit that he was indisposed for some days after.² Later in the evening the whole party were conducted to an illuminated grotto, where an orchestra of “40 violins, 2 flutes, 2 voyces of Women” performed, and “a Pastorale” (the title of which has not survived) was acted. It is interesting to note that this is one of the very few occasions when English men of letters are recorded to have been present at a play in France during the classic age of French drama. On 3 September the “Duke’s gentlemen,” a term which may have included

¹ State Papers, France. Francis Vernon (secretary to Lord Montague), 20 August, 1670.

² Ibid., 27 August, 1670.

1670 Buckhurst, Sedley and Sprat, departed.¹ Buckingham himself lingered on for ten days, and before leaving was presented with a diamond-hilted sword by the French King.² He brought back to England³ a young Breton lady with a pretty "baby face," called Louise de K  roualle, who had formerly been a Maid of Honour to Madame Henriette, and who had already attracted the attention of the King of England when she visited Dover with her mistress in April. Under the title of the Duchess of Portsmouth she was destined to become at once the most powerful and the most unpopular of the mistresses of Charles II.

Sedley's intimacy with Buckingham seems to have been especially close about this time. In the spring 1671 of 1671,⁴ handsome young William Wycherley took the town by storm with his first comedy, "Love in a Wood, or St. James's Park," produced at the King's house in Drury Lane. Like Etherege and Shadwell before him, he was at once admitted into the circle of Wits. The tale of how he made the acquaintance of the Duchess of Cleveland (formerly Lady Castlemaine) is well known. He soon became her acknowledged lover, much to the indignation of her cousin, Buckingham, who had previously held that position in more or less friendly rivalry with his royal master. Wycherley, alarmed at making such a powerful enemy, is said to have applied to Rochester and Sedley to help him to make his peace with the Duke. How they performed

¹ State Papers, France. Francis Vernon, 3 September, 1670.

² The Dispatches of William Perwich, ed. Royal Historical Society, 1903, p. 110.

³ Or rather he brought her as far as Dieppe and left her there, having promised to send a yacht to fetch her. As he characteristically forgot all about her, the damsel was marooned for ten days at the seaport, till Colbert, the French Ambassador in London, exerted himself on her behalf. See Burghclere's "Life of Buckingham," p. 230. Also Perwich's Dispatches, p. 111.

⁴ See W. C. Ward's introduction to Wycherley's plays in the Mermaid series.

this task is best told in the words of John Dennis, who 1671 may have heard the story from Wycherley himself:

"He (Mr. Wycherley) applied himself therefore to Wilmot, Lord Rochester, and to Sir Charles Sedley, and entreated them to remonstrate to the Duke of Buckingham the Mischief he was about to do to one who had not the Honour to be known to him, and who had never offended him. Upon their opening the Matter to the Duke, he cry'd out immediately that he did not blame Wycherley, he only accused his Cousin.

"Ay, but, they reply'd, by rendering him suspected of such an Intrigue, you are about to ruine him, that is, your Grace is about to ruine a Man with whose Conversation you would be pleas'd above all things. Upon this Occasion they said so much of the shining Qualities of Mr. Wycherley and of the Charms of his Conversation, that the Duke, who is as much in love with Wit as with his Kinswoman, was impatient till he should be brought to sup with him, which was in two or three Nights. After Supper Mr. Wycherley, who was then in the height of his Vigor both of Body and of Mind, thought himself obliged to exert himself, and the Duke was charm'd to that degree that he cry'd out in a Transport, 'By G——, my Cousin was in the right of it'; and from that very Moment made a Friend of a Man whom he believ'd to be his happy Rival."¹

We catch another glimpse of Sedley in Buckingham's company in August. A Mr. Brockenden, writing to Sir Robert Paston on the 19th, tells how he had seen "last night" the Duke "with the Count[ess] of Shrewsbury, Sir C. Sydley and James Porter with him in the coach," driving to Holland House, which it was rumoured that his Grace was going to buy.² Holland

¹ "Original Letters," etc., by John Dennis (8vo, 1721), Vol. I. pp. 218-19.

² Hist. MSS. Comm., 6th Report, Appendix, p. 369 b. (Mr. Brockenden to Sir R. Paston, 20 August, 1671.)

1671 House was a famous mansion at Kensington, the property of the Earls of Holland. It appears to have been let at this time to the Earl of Anglesey, and Buckingham made several visits with a view to taking it.¹

The Countess of Shrewsbury was the fascinating but depraved Anne Brudenell, for whom Buckingham had deserted his unfortunate wife, and who lived with the Duke after he had killed her husband, the Earl of Shrewsbury, in 1668.

In December "The Rehearsal," Buckingham's long-expected skit on Davenant, Dryden, Sir Robert Howard and the whole tribe of "heroic" dramatists, was produced at Drury Lane. We may be sure that Sir Charles Sedley was among the brilliant audience which applauded Lacy's acting on the first night. His name is connected with the play by the author of the "Life of Jo. Hayns" (8vo, 1701), who records that the gentlemen who especially delighted in that actor's impersonation of Bayes (he took the part when Lacy was ill) were "the Earl of R[ochester], Lord B[uckhurst], and Sir Charles S[edley]."²

The date of the production of "The Rehearsal" perhaps marks the full and joyous maturity of the society of Wits, which now included some of the most brilliant writers in England. Rochester's famous lines (perhaps written about this time) preserve the names of its chief members, and express exactly the aristocratic disdain for public opinion which characterised their lives and writings:

¹ "We hear that the Duke of Buckingham is to take Holland House of the Earl of Ang. He has been there three nights successively." (Mr. Brockenden to Sir R. Paston; see above.)

² "The Life of the Famous Comedian, Jo. Hayns," etc. (London, 4to, 1701), p. 5. The text gives only the initials of Hayns' admirers: "The Earl of R., Lord B., Sir Charles S." The full names "Earl of Rochester, L^d Buckhurst, Sir Charles Sedley" are written in the margin of the Brit. Mus. copy in a contemporary hand (Brit. Mus. 641, e., 18(1)).

"I loathe the Rabble, 'tis enough for me
 If SEDLEY, SHADWEL, SHEPPARD, WICHERLEY, GODOLPHIN, BUTLER, BUCKHURST, BUCKINGHAM,
 And some few more, whom I omit to name,
 Approve my Sense, I count their Censure Fame."¹

1671

It is interesting to find a very different kind of person from Buckingham and his friends among Sedley's acquaintances at this time. Sir William Joyner, a devout Roman Catholic, of whom Hearne² writes that "he was one of the most retired men I have known," published his single tragedy, "The Roman Empress," in 1671. This work, which had been performed with success at the King's house, is dedicated by the author to Sir Charles Sedley in the most complimentary terms. He ascribes to him an "elevated wit," "rich fancy," and "subtile judgment," "which qualities concur in you in so high a perfection that there is no free noble soul which denyes you herein the just tribute of preference." It is surely incredible that the man to whom a grave and pious person like Joyner could address such words was the mere rakehell of the eighteenth and nineteenth-century biographers.

¹ These lines are from Rochester's "Imitation of the Tenth Satire of the First Book of Horace," originally printed in the "Antwerpen" edition (8vo, ?1680), where they appear in the following form:

"I loathe the Rabble, 'tis enough for me
 If S——, S——, W——,
 G——, B——, B——, B——,
 And some few more whom I omit to name,
 Approve my sense, I count their Censure Fame."

The lines quoted in the text with the names in full are from "The Works of the Right Honourable the Earls of Rochester and Roscommon, etc." (8vo, 1709,) p. 22.

² Quoted in D. N. B., s.a. Sir William Joyner.

CHAPTER VI

KATHERINE SAVAGE AND OTHERS

"Our Arcadia is in Hyde Park and the Mulberry Garden; our nymphs are modishly attired, and our love-sick swains are powdered beaux."—A. H. Bullen (Preface to "Musa Proterva," 1889).

1657 THERE were several reasons why Sir Charles Sedley's marriage, though doubtless considered a good match for both bride and bridegroom, was likely to end in disaster. That Katherine Savage was a Roman Catholic, while the Sedleys were all Anglicans, was sufficient at least to endanger the prospects of domestic peace in an age when the Roman Catholic religion was regarded with fanatical hatred by most Protestants; while Sir Charles's leaning towards free-thought, or rationalism (as illustrated by the oration at the Cock), would hardly improve matters, since a deist or infidel of the seventeenth century was likely to regard Catholicism as merely a debased form of the prevailing "superstition."

Moreover, as the combined ages of the young couple in 1657 probably fell short of forty, it may be supposed that their mutual affection was as transitory as most of the passions of very early youth. The shortness of the interval which divided the marriage of Sir William with the eldest daughter of Earl Rivers from that of Sir Charles with her sister, suggests that the latter was a business arrangement concluded between the two families in order to renew the bond broken by the death of the elder baronet.* Perhaps Elizabeth, Lady Sedley, arranged the match on the old principle of marrying sons early in order to prevent the sowing of wild oats.

No precaution could have been more futile on the eve ¹⁶⁵⁷ of the great sowing of wild oats that followed the Restoration. A premature and unwise marriage, probably engineered by well-meaning but short-sighted relatives, may thus be added to the causes that have been already suggested for the wild life led by Sir Charles in the 'sixties. The fact that poor Lady Katherine presented her husband with a single daughter in place of the son and heir which every English baronet desires, would increase the chances of discord, while the final solvent of this unfortunate union was probably a strain of eccentricity in the Savage family,¹ which in Lady Katherine developed into actual madness.

The early years of the married life of the Sedleys ¹⁶⁵⁸ seem to have passed peaceably enough, and, as we hear of Sir Charles and his lady driving together in his coach on 17 May, 1658,² it is to be hoped that, by then, no cloud had appeared on the matrimonial horizon. There is no further record of Lady Katherine Sedley's married life except the statements that she "had been far from an exemplary Catholic"—which may imply that, like her husband, she took part in the orgy of riotous living that followed the Restoration—and that "after a few years of married life (she) lost her reason and had to be placed under the care of a Catholic Physician skilled in this kind of malady."³ If she became insane soon after the Restoration, her condition may have been either a cause or a result of her husband's way of living. A mad wife certainly might drive a man "aux tavernes et aux filles," but a husband whose conduct resembled that of Sir Charles in the years 1663

¹ The third Earl Rivers, her brother, was a miser and was robbed by his son (afterwards the fourth Earl), who was called "Tyburn Dick" (see D. N. B., s.a. Savage, Richard, fourth Earl Rivers).

² See p. 47.

³ These statements are from the narrative of Father Bede of St. Simon Stock, quoted in Father B. Zimmerman's "Carmel in England," p. 236; see below, p. 122.

1658 and 1668 might equally have deranged the mind of a highly-strung and sensitive woman with a hereditary tendency towards eccentricity. The "Catholic Physician" is said to have treated Lady Sedley's "malady" according to the barbarous contemporary practice, with drugs which, she pathetically complained, "would impair her health." The condition of this unhappy lady sitting alone in the house in Great Queen Street is a melancholy pendant to the merry meetings at Locket's and the Rose. She is entitled to a place among the pathetic company of the wronged ladies of the Restoration, which includes Queen Katherine and the Duchess of Buckingham; though, in justice to Sir Charles Sedley, it must be admitted that there is no evidence that he ever treated his wife with the barbarity that Buckingham displayed in his dealings with his unfortunate lady.

Lady Sedley's mania took the form of a fixed idea that she was a queen. She is said to have insisted on being addressed as "Your Majesty," and to have shown "extreme vanity." This hallucination may have been the effect of brooding over the parallel between her fate and that of Katherine of Braganza, and the similarity between the conduct of their respective husbands. The fact that the Christian names of the Sedleys were identical with those of Charles II and his 1665-72 consort probably strengthened the delusion.

At some time between 1665 and 1672,¹ Sir Charles

¹ The following details are from the translation of an Italian manuscript by Father Bede of St. Simon Stock contained in Father B. Zimmerman's "Carmel in England" (Burns and Oates, London, 1899), pp. 235-8. No indication of the exact date of Father Bede's visit to Lady Sedley is given, but it is stated that the MS. describes events which took place between 1665 and 1672, when the Father was Vicar Provincial. As the description of Lady Sedley's case occurs in the latter part of the narrative, it may be supposed that it was nearer the latter date than the former when Father Bede met her, and this fits in with the fact that Sir Charles's second "marriage" took place in April 1672; see below, p. 129.

was enabled to get rid of his unfortunate wife. During 1665-72 these years a certain Carmelite friar, called Father Bede of St. Simon Stock (his secular name was Walter Joseph Travers), was in London. He was the head of a Roman Catholic mission in England in the reign of Charles II, and was a rather important person in that curious "Papist" underworld which, in spite of a brutal persecution, continued to exist and even to proselytise in Restoration London. He had been instrumental in the conversion of Lord Castlemaine, the contemptible husband of the King's mistress, and was often consulted by Roman Catholic ladies. He was asked to visit Lady Sedley, whom he describes as "the wife of a most eccentric English nobleman with a revenue of twenty thousand scudi."¹ Lady Sedley gave the priest "a most kind welcome," and complained a good deal to him about her treatment and surroundings. It struck him that "she spoke with great reverence of the Lady Abbess of Ghent, who at that time was in London collecting funds for her abbey." This Lady Abbess was a certain Dame Mary Knatchbull, the head of a society of English Benedictine nuns at Ghent, who, according to Father Bede, had "burdened themselves with debt to such an extent" by certain building operations that they "knew not where to turn for help." Dame Knatchbull had been kind to Charles II during his exile, and had already made one visit to England to collect money in 1661, when the King gave her £3000.² A decade later his Majesty probably had no money to spare, and the Abbess had to fall back on the generosity of private persons. Father Bede seems to have regarded Lady Sedley's condition as a heaven-sent opportunity to repair the fortunes of Dame Knatchbull's nunnery. He "went 1665-72 straight to the Abbess," and returned with her to Lady Sedley, whom they "found in tears" because, as she explained, "she could not possibly leave England." The next day Father Bede visited her again, and "the conversation turned chiefly on the Abbess." Finally, she sent the Father to her husband with "a message to the effect that she was willing to go to Ghent." Sir Charles, as we can easily imagine, was "well pleased." He accompanied Father Bede "back to Lady Sedley"—it appears that husband and wife were living apart—to make "some further arrangements." Then the whole party proceeded to the abode of the Abbess, where it was decided that the afflicted lady was to live at the nunnery at Ghent on "a pension of four hundred pounds to be paid by the family." "The family," it would appear, meant Sir Charles.

¹ About £4000 in English money.

² Gillow's "Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics," IV. 65. Dame Knatchbull belonged to an old Kentish family, members of which were probably acquainted with the Sedleys.

As Lady Sedley desired to leave England immediately, it was necessary to provide her with an escort. Her husband does not seem to have volunteered his services, and the Abbess refused to take charge of her, so the task of conducting "the patient" to the seaport fell to the good-natured Father Bede. Before they departed, Sir Charles told the Father that the wife "wore jewels to the value of four thousand scudi" (£800), and asked him "to obtain them if possible." How far he was justified in making this request it is impossible to say. If the jewels were heirlooms of the Sedley family, it seems right that they should have been restored to its representative on the dissolution of the marriage, which was, in fact, taking place. Father Bede, who was probably as ignorant of the rights of the case as the present writer, hit on an excellent device. During the journey he did all he could to persuade Lady Sedley to give up the jewels, but met with an obstinate refusal. When they arrived near the sea, however, she consented to let him take charge of them. He divided them into two equal portions, one of which he kept for Sir Charles, while he reserved the other for the lady, to whom he restored it "later on." The jewels included "a gold watch studded with diamonds." Father Bede adds ingenuously that "nothing whatever remained in my hands." 1665-72

The rest of Lady Sedley's history can be briefly told. She entered the convent at Ghent, where she was visited a year later by Father Bede. Her first question was about the jewels. The Father replied "that her husband kept them for her Majesty," because she insisted on being addressed in that style. She answered in dreadful excitement, "I shall have the gates of the town closed and you shall go to prison." She then left the room. After a while a message came to bid Father Bede stay, and presently "her Majesty" returned very much calmed down, and said quite cheerfully, "Sir, the cause for which I came hither no longer exists, and I am quite willing to return to England." The Father, in his own words, "politely declined the honour of accompanying 'her Majesty,'" and left Ghent quietly. He adds: "Many other incidents occurred in regard to that case," but unfortunately does not relate them. 1672-1705

Lady Sedley's pension, which was paid regularly, helped the Abbess to clear off the debts of the community, and according to Father Bede proved "a great help towards establishing the present prosperous state of the abbey." This pension seems to have been reduced later—probably when the finances of the abbey were stabilised—to £200.¹ Lady Sedley outlived her husband, and died at Ghent on 1 July, 1705.²

Very little definite information survives concerning the numerous temporary "flames" with which Sir Charles consoled himself for the loss of his wife's society. Like the other Wits, he doubtless began to "fawn on those little insignificant Creatures, the Players,"³ soon after the innovation of employing actresses was introduced, and his special connection 1660-72

¹ "Carmel in England," p. 235 n.

² Ibid.

³ "The Man of Mode," II. ii.

1660-72 with the theatre would give him ready access to the tiring-room, where good looks, witty conversation, and, above all, a plentiful supply of guineas easily overcame the very fragile defences which guarded the virtue of its fair occupants. It is probable, though not absolutely proved, that he had a liaison with that lively actress, Mrs. Knipp or Knepp. As we have seen, she knew all about the approaching production of "The Mulberry Garden" in January 1667/8, and was, apparently, cast for the chief female part in Sedley's comedy. From these circumstances it is natural to suppose that she was acquainted with the author. A transcript of one of Sedley's love-poems in a contemporary hand in the Bodleian furnishes a conclusive proof of this intimacy. The poem, which, in the printed versions, is headed "To Celia," is here introduced by the words "To Mrs. Mary Napp."¹ Mrs. Knipp's name is actually spelt "Napp" in the printed cast of Lord Orrery's "The Black Prince" (fol. 1669), so there is no doubt that Sedley's poem is addressed to her. It is very interesting to find that Mrs. Mary Knipp, or Napp, seems to have been a close ally of Nell Gwynne. They nearly always acted together,² and it was very natural that when Lord Buckhurst was Nelly's lover, her friend Mary Knipp should be the mistress of Sir Charles Sedley, his lordship's inseparable companion. Mrs. Knipp also bestowed her favours on Mr. Samuel Pepys, as readers of the Diary are aware. She had a surly "jealous-looking" husband who, according to Pepys, was "a kind of jockey." Her life seems to have been far from happy, and there are records of her having been arrested twice; on 12 February, 1667/8, and 23 April,

¹ It is the poem beginning "As in those Nations where they yet adore" (Kemp's Collection, p. 43, Miscellaneous Works, 1702, p. 51). The Bodleian transcript is in a MS. book of contemporary verse (West. MS. Eng. Poet., c, 4).

² Knipp acted Asteria to Nell's Florimel in the "Maiden Queen," and Nakar to her St. Catherine in "Tyrannic Love." They sang the prologue to Howard's "Duke of Lerma" together.

1668,¹ about a fortnight before she told Pepys about 1660-72 Sedley's new play.

Sedley had another connection with a pretty actress 1668 named "Pegg" at the King's house. Pepys, calling at Drury Lane on 7 May, 1668,² saw (and kissed) this lady, apparently behind the scenes. He roundly declares that she "was Sir Charles Sidly's mistress," and adds emphatically, "a mighty pretty woman and seems, but is not, modest." It is evident that "Pegg" is a Christian name,³ and the only actress at the King's house whose Christian name is known to be Margaret is the famous Mrs. Hughes,⁴ afterward Prince Rupert's mistress. Lord Braybrooke, in his edition of Pepys's Diary, identified her with "Pegg." The chief difficulty is that Pepys describes her as "newly come," a description which could hardly be applied to Margaret Hughes, who was one of the very first English actresses and had been with the King's company since 1663. There 1668-76 are, of course, many actresses whose Christian names are unknown. A Mrs. James probably joined the Theatre Royal company in the spring of 1668. If it could be shown that her Christian name was Margaret, she might be identical with Pepys's "Pegg." On the other hand, a satire written on Sedley some years later refers to him as "the Apostolick Bard of Mother Hewes,"⁵ but it is not clear if this "Mother Hewes" refers to the actress. It may be remarked that an actress

¹ Warrants cited in Allardyce Nicoll's "Restoration Drama," p. 287 n.

² Pepys's Diary (ed. Wheatley), VIII. 7.

³ Peter Cunningham, in a letter to Notes and Queries (24 November, 1849), suggested that Pepys's "Pegg" was a surname and stood for Katherine Pegge, a lady who had a child by Charles II. Lord Braybrooke, replying in Notes and Queries, 26 January, 1850, pointed out that Katherine Pegge was in her fortieth year in 1668 and that there is no record of her ever having been on the stage.

⁴ Margaret Hughes was certainly called "Peg Hughes" in one of Tom Brown's "Letters from the Dead to the Living," Works (12mo, 1719), II. 241.

⁵ See below, p. 166.

1668-76 called Mrs. Hughes, who was, perhaps, identical with Prince Rupert's mistress, acted the minor part of Charmion in Sedley's tragedy of "Antony and Cleopatra" in 1676. Oldys records the fact that Sir Charles had "two naturall daughters named L. and E. Charlot." According to the same authority he settled part of his estate on them.¹

1670 At an unknown date—probably about 1670—Sir Charles met a young lady called Ann Ayscough, whose influence changed the whole course of his life. She was a daughter of Henry Ayscough, a Yorkshire gentleman of an old family, who was imprisoned in the Fleet for many years, and who seems to have been always in rather needy circumstances.² One of his daughters, Frances, married a Joseph Ayloffe, a distinguished barrister of Gray's Inn and grandson of Sir William Ayloffe, an Essex baronet.³ As Sedley seems to have been well acquainted both with Joseph Ayloffe and his son, Captain William Ayloffe, in later years, it is probable that he originally met Ann Ayscough, the sister of Mrs. Ayloffe, at her brother-in-law's house. It would be perfectly natural for a libertine like Sir Charles to make love to the barrister's pretty sister-in-law, and, from an extremely interesting poem (printed among Sedley's works), it seems that he actually started by treating the affair as one of his usual temporary "flames," but met his match in the lady, whose beauty and character so captivated him that he consented to make her the head of his household, and, in every sense except a legal one, his wife. The opening 1670 verses describe the change in the Baronet's intentions (which originally appear to have been far from honourable):

¹ Oldys, Notes to Langbaine, Note No. 2. See Appendix I, p. 318.

² There is a minute concerning a petition from Henry Ayscough, a prisoner in the Fleet, to Cromwell, preserved in the Bodleian (Rawl. MS. A, 37, f. 711). In the Cal. State Papers Dom., Chas. II, 1661-2, p. 420, there is a record of a petition of Henry Ayscough to the King for £300 lent to his Majesty, "with recommendation of the petitioners on account of their condition." He still seems to have been in the Fleet in 1660 and 1661, for two petitions from him bearing these dates and written from that prison are calendared in Hist. MSS. Comm., 7th Report, Appendix, pp. 115*b*, 144*b*.

³ Morant's "Essex," p. 71.

"Cloris, I justly am betray'd
By a design my self had laid;
Like an old Rook, whom in his cheat
A run of Fortune does defeat,
I thought at first with a small sum
Of love thy heap to overcome;
Presuming on thy want of art,
Thy gentle and unpractis'd heart."

The poem ends with a reference to the fact that their author was already married:

"My hand, alas, is no more mine
Else it had long ago been thine.
My heart I give thee, and we call
No man unjust who parts with all.
What a priest says moves not the mind,
Souls are by love, not words, combin'd."¹

It is very significant that in the version of this poem published by Ann Ayscough's nephew, Captain William Ayloffe, after Sedley's death, the last two lines are omitted, perhaps by the editor out of deference to his aunt, or possibly by Sir Charles himself, because of the change in his attitude towards religion since the days of his anti-biblical harangue at the Cock.

In April 1672,² Sedley, who had perhaps recently 1672

¹ Kemp's Collection, I. 21.

² MS. note in a Pedigree of the Sedley family in book of MS. Kentish Pedigrees (Bodl., Rawl. MS. B, 82, f.). "Sir Charles Sydley 4th Baronett of Southfleet marryd Lady Cath. Savage da: of — E. Rivers & sent her to a monastery & marryd M^s — Ayscough da of — in Aprill 1672." The italicised words are added in a different handwriting from that of the rest of the pedigree. Cf. Cokayne's "Baronetage" (s.a. Sir Charles Sedley): "By Catherine Ayscough of Yorkshire (with whom he is said to have celebrated a marriage during his wife's lifetime) he had a natural son. . . ." The name "Catherine" in Cokayne seems to be a mistake perhaps arising from the fact that the writer had just mentioned Catherine, Lady Rivers, and her daughter Catherine, Lady Sedley.

1672 sent his legal wife to the nunnery at Ghent, went through a form of marriage with Ann Ayscough. This "wedding" was, of course, quite illegal,¹ but it was easy to bribe a needy "Levite" in the seventeenth century to perform the ceremony without asking any awkward questions. It was probably soon after this "marriage" that Ann Ayscough presented Sir Charles with a son, who was named Charles after his father and was known by the name of Sedley as though born in lawful wedlock.² A second son, named William (probably in memory of the gay Sir William who died before the Restoration), died in infancy and was buried in 1672-76 October 1676, in Southfleet church,³ where his name is entered in the burial register as "Wilhelmus filius Caroli Sedley militis et Baronett," a formula probably devised by the vicar or parish clerk to satisfy his own scruples against calling an illegitimate child by the family name, and, at the same time, to avoid offending the Lord of the Manor.

It is fairly certain that the reformation of Sir Charles's manners which began about this date was due chiefly to Ann Ayscough's influence. He seems to have withdrawn from the brilliant but profligate circle of Buckingham and the Countess of Shrewsbury, of Other authorities call her Ann (e.g. the deed quoted by Haslewood: see Appendix I. p. 322), and the entry recording her death in Southfleet Parish Register (see p. 234).

¹ Not only was it illegal, but Sedley was liable to a prosecution under an Act of James I which made bigamy an offence punishable by death. He would have been exempt from the penalty if he had obtained a divorce "a mensa et thoro" from the ecclesiastical courts, although his second marriage would still have been illegal. There is, however, no record of his having obtained the ecclesiastical divorce among the case papers of these courts preserved in the Public Record Office.

² The younger Sir Charles Sedley was knighted by William III in 1688/9 (see p. 203), when he is said to have been a minor. He married in 1695, when it may be supposed that he was over twenty-one. Hence he was probably born before 1674.

³ Southfleet Parish Register, 10 October, 1676. This entry is the only one in Latin among many relating to the Sedley family.

which he was a prominent member in 1670 and 1671, 1672-76 and to have passed his time in comparative retirement for many years. It is significant that Mrs. Ayscough insisted on a religious "marriage" in order to regularise her situation as much as possible, and it appears that her family accepted her union with Sedley as perfectly honourable. For a moment, perhaps, she suspected that Sir Charles would revert to the habits of his youth. Some charming lines survive in which he replies to such suspicions:

"Fear not, my Dear, a flame can never die,
That is once kindled by so bright an eye,

For though thy Beauty first allured my sight,
Yet now I look on it but as the light
That led me to the treasury of thy mind."

There can be little doubt that these verses are addressed to the same person as the poem to "Cloris" cited above, and they confirm the supposition that Sir Charles was at first attracted merely by the lady's external qualities, but later found that she had more enduring charms.

Perhaps Ann Ayscough helped to re-establish the financial as well as the moral reputation of her "husband." His expenditure must have been enormous in the first riotous decade after the Restoration. At the beginning of February 1672, two months before his second marriage, he was actually arrested, probably at the instance of some irate creditor.¹ He was driving in his coach "near the Old Exchange" in the City, when a certain constable called Daniel Axton, or Ackson, forced him to descend, carried off the coach and horses to "the Greene Yard" (or City Pound) in Lower Whitecross Street (a place where "stray or offending horses, cattle and carriages were taken and impounded"), while the Baronet, his coachman and other servants were haled to the Compter, the City prison for debtors in Southwark. Having somehow obtained his release, Sir Charles complained of his arrest from his seat in 1672 the House of Commons on 8 February, informing the House that he had been arrested "though the constable was informed and did know that he was a member of the House." The Commons ordered their Serjeant-at-Arms to apprehend the constable for his breach of the privilege of Parliament, and referred the matter to the Committee of Privileges. On 25 February, Ackson (whose Christian name had now become "Samuell") petitioned the House, doubtless asking them to consider circumstances that extenuated his offence. On 7 March it was ordered that he should be released from custody provided that he paid "his Fees." Before he was allowed to depart, Sir Charles Sedley had the satisfaction of seeing him kneel at the bar of the House while the Speaker reprimanded him for daring to lay hands on a member of Parliament.

¹ House of Commons Journals, IX. 251, 256, 264.

1673 By 5 July, 1673, Sir Charles had put his affairs sufficiently in order to be accepted as a good "surety" for a certain Edmond Ashton, Receiver of Hearth-money for the County of Lancashire.¹ On 21 June, 1675, he raised £4120 by mortgage on his lands, probably with the object of paying off outstanding debts.²

When Ann Ayscough became the recognised head of Sir Charles Sedley's household, she must have taken charge of Katherine, the fourteen-year-old daughter of Lady Sedley. If this young person had already begun to display the qualities for which she was afterwards celebrated, it may be supposed that there was little love lost between her and the woman whose very presence in her father's house must have seemed an insult to the memory of her unfortunate mother. Katherine was a dark, thin girl, with bold, sparkling eyes. She was no beauty, but she had a real gift for conversation, and especially for satire, which she doubtless inherited from her father. Her childhood must have been neglected and stormy, passed as it was in a household in which the master spent his nights at the Cock or the Rose, while the mistress was the mad ¹⁶⁷³ "patient" of a "Catholic physician." Such an upbringing was appropriately rounded off by her introduction at a very early age into the most dissolute society in Europe. These were the days when the three sultanas, Portsmouth, Cleveland and Mazarin, reigned at Whitehall in a voluptuous setting that was probably unequalled in contemporary Europe, while the merry odalisque, Nelly, enlivened, though by no means completed, the royal harem. The qualities of a saint would have been necessary in order to escape the contamination of such an atmosphere, and qualities of this kind were not likely to be found in a daughter of Sir Charles Sedley. Mr. John Evelyn, whom she visited with other young ladies of quality when she was only fifteen (on 13 June, 1673), summed her up—at that tender age—as "none of the most virtuous but a witt."¹ This description might have served as her epitaph. A few days after Katherine Sedley's visit to Evelyn, Mary of Modena landed at Dover and was married to James, Duke of York. It appears to have been in the circle of this beautiful princess that the daughter of Sir Charles Sedley made her first appearance at Court.

¹ Cal. Treasury Papers, IV. (1672-5), p. 367.

² Haslewood's Notes to Jacob, Note No. 10 (Appendix I. p. 322).

The Countess of Dorchester.

In the years immediately following his separation from his wife and the reconstitution of his household, Sir Charles Sedley was engaged in the composition of a tragedy. Probably he consoled himself during his retirement from the society of the Wits by turning to his books. The result of his studies was a heroic play on the subject of Antony and Cleopatra, which to-day seems the most worthless of his writings. It had, however, a very good reception on the stage, when produced at the Duke's Theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields in February 1676/7, where it was still being acted in March.² ^{1676/77} An elaborate musical setting by Jeremiah Clarke³

¹ Evelyn's Diary, ed. Dobson, II. 358.

² Hist. MSS. Comm., 12th Report, Appendix IX. (Duke of Beaufort's MSS.), p. 66. (Marquis of Worcester to Marchioness, 17 March, 1676.)

³ See D. N. B., s.a. Clarke, Jeremiah.

1676/77 must have contributed greatly to its success. John Dryden was probably one of the audience, and the performance may well have suggested to him the idea of writing a tragedy on the same subject. It is at least remarkable that his "All for Love" was produced in the following year, and, of course, drove Sedley's piece from the stage for ever. Eleven months before the performance of "Antony and Cleopatra," a very different and, to a modern taste, far more attractive play, Sir George Etherege's masterpiece, "The Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter," was staged, as its hero would have said, with great éclat, by the Duke's company at their magnificent new theatre in Dorset Gardens. The new Duchess of York, to whom the comedy was dedicated, was present with her husband at the first performance, and it is very likely that the witty Dorinda, as Mrs. Sedley¹ was nicknamed, was in their train. Doubtless she recognised her father in the pit, for we may be sure that "little Sid" came out of his retirement to do honour to the triumph of "Gentle George," especially when we recollect that the play was a perfect incarnation of the spirit of the whole group of Wits.

1676/77 In the winter of 1676/7, Mrs. Katherine Sedley seems to have been already a well-known figure at Court. Towards the end of January, the Duchess of York gave a ball at Whitehall, during which a violent quarrel broke out between "Dorinda" and Sir Car Scroop, a witty young member of her father's circle who had written the prologue to "The Man of Mode." The origin of the quarrel seems to have been an exchange of extremely scurrilous verses. One of these lampoons, which was attributed to Sir Car, insinuated that Katherine was "as mad as her mother and as vicious as her father." The victim of this attack repaid its reputed author with a maidenly effusion hinting very broadly at his relations with a certain Mrs. 1676/77 Fraser, a wealthy young heiress, daughter of Sir Alexander Fraser, the King's Scottish physician. It was notorious that Sir Car was courting this young lady, whose charms—and expectations—were doing great execution at Court, and Mrs. Sedley, doubtless glad of an opportunity to revenge herself simultaneously on an enemy and a rival, suggested that the professional attendance of Mrs. Fraser's father would soon be necessary both for his daughter and her prospective husband.¹

¹ The title "Mrs." is used throughout the present work in the seventeenth-century manner to denote the unmarried woman.

Sir Car Scroop was not the only author who ventured to satirise Mrs. Sedley. Charles Sackville, formerly Lord Buckhurst and now Earl of Dorset, her father's old friend and playmate, wrote a series of dainty little pasquils on "Dorinda" at various stages in her career. The earliest probably refers to her first appearance at Court.²

*"Dorinda's sparkling Wit, and Eyes,
Uniting cast too fierce a Light,
Which blazes high but quickly dyes,
Pains not the Heart but hurts the Sight.*

*Love is a calmer, gentler Joy,
Smooth are his looks, and soft his pace;
Her Cupid is a Black-Guard Boy³
That runs his Link full in your face."*

In the spring of 1677 there was serious talk of a 1677 marriage between Katherine Sedley and her distant

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., 12th Report, Appendix, Part V. Vol. II. p. 37. (Letters from Lady Chaworth to Lord Roos, 30 January, 1676/7.)

² The version given here is found on p. 94 of "A New Miscellany of Original Poems," etc., London, 1701 (Gildon's Miscellany). The last word in the fourth line in Gildon's version is "Eyes," which is obviously a misprint for "Sight" (the reading of all later editions of Dorset's poems).

³ This must be a very early use of the adjective "blackguard" in something like the modern sense (earliest in N. E. D. in this sense is 1683). The Black-Guard was a troop of "idle dirty boys that lie about the Horse Guards and the Mews and Ride horses to water (commonly called the Black guard)." (News-letter cited by Lady A. E. N. Newdigate in "Cavalier and Puritan," p. 86.)

1677 relative, the handsome Jack Churchill, a Colonel of His Majesty's Foot Guards. This brilliant young man was already engaged to a beautiful but penniless Maid of Honour called Sarah Jennings, but his parents, Sir Winston and Lady Churchill, endeavoured to make him break with her and marry the daughter of the wealthy Sir Charles Sedley.¹ Churchill yielded at first to his parents, and the match was nearly concluded when Mrs. Jennings wrote her treacherous lover a letter that worked upon his feelings to such an extent that, in spite of his well-known avarice, he resolved to abandon Katherine and her fortune and marry for love. Henry Savile, Sedley's friend, seems to have acted as intermediary between the Churchills and the Sedleys in the delicate business of breaking off the engagement.²

Having failed to secure the Colonel, "Dorinda" attempted to obtain an official position in the royal household. A vacancy among the Queen's Maids of Honour was caused by the marriage of one of their number, Mrs. Howard, in November 1677, and Katherine applied for the place. She failed to obtain it, and, when rejected, is said to have "scorned" it. A contemporary implies that her haughtiness was already well known by expressing surprise that she ever deigned "to look so low as to think of itt."³ On 27

¹ Wolseley's "Marlborough," II. 186-8.

² A letter of his to this effect is quoted in Wolseley's "Marlborough" (I. 189). It is dated 8/18 May, 1677, so it may be supposed that Churchill and Katherine Sedley were engaged in the winter or early spring of 1676/7. Sarah Jennings wrote on one of Churchill's letters many years later: "This letter was writ when I was angry at something his father and mother had made a disagreeable noise in the town about, when they had a mind to make him marry a shocking creature for money." The "shocking creature" was Katherine Sedley. It is interesting to speculate whether she would have made as successful a Duchess of Marlborough as her rival. She was quite as clever and quite as haughty, and she possessed far more wit and humour than Sarah.

³ Hist. MSS. Comm., 12th Report, Appendix, Part V. Vol. II. pp. 42, 43. (Lady Chaworth to Lord Roos, 22 November, and 11 December, 1677.)

December¹ it was rumoured that she was going to 1677 marry "the widdower Sir Húngerford." This gentleman was Sir Edward Hungerford, the builder of Hungerford Market on the site of the present Charing Cross Station. He was twenty-six years older than Katherine and had already been married twice.² Mrs. Sedley's portion was estimated at this time at £6000, with £4000 at her father's death.³ Hence it would appear that she was no longer the sole heir of Sir Charles, and that he had already resolved to bequeath a large part of his estate to his son by Ann Ayscough.

It must have been at the beginning of 1678 that a 1678 person of far more exalted rank than Colonel Jack Churchill or "Sir Hungerford" yielded to the charms of "Dorinda's sparkling wit and eyes." It was probably about this time that she became a Maid of Honour to Mary of Modena,⁴ and attracted the attention of James, Duke of York. The vices of this prince have been described as a caricature of those of his brother. While Charles, at any rate, had the excuse that his mistresses were among the most beautiful women of the age, James made his intrigues appear in the most sordid light by selecting as his favourites the plainest damsels of the Court. Lady Denham and Lady Bellasis, it is true, were handsome women; but Arabella Churchill and Katherine Sedley were notoriously plain. Katherine, speaking of herself and the rest of the Duke's harem, said: "We are none of us handsome, and if we had wit,

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., 12th Report, Appendix, Part V. Vol. II. p. 44 (same to same, 27 December, 1677).

² His first wife, Jane, daughter of Sir John Hele, died in 1664. The second was a Jane Culme, who died in 1674. (D. N. B., s.a. Sir Edward Hungerford.)

³ Hist. MSS. Comm., 12th Report, Appendix, Part V. Vol. II. p. 44.

⁴ "Mrs. Sidley" appears in the 12th edition of Chamberlayne's "Anglia Notitia" (1679, p. 206) among the Duchess's "Maids of Honour." She is not mentioned in the 7th edition (1677). I have not seen the 8th, 9th, 10th or 11th editions.

1678 he has not enough to discover it,"¹ while Charles II said his confessor imposed his mistresses on James by way of penance.²

Katherine Sedley seems to have awakened in her ducal lover a far stronger passion than any of her predecessors, whose influence had been very transitory. His feelings towards her would appear to have been the most passionate of which his cold, narrow character was capable. It is difficult to explain why an elderly roué, who was now a devout and even bigoted Roman Catholic, should have fallen violently in love with a young lady who had no claim to be considered a beauty, but who was the possessor of a biting and irreverent wit which she loved to exercise on the very objects which James held most sacred. There is a sense, indeed, in which the pair were admirably suited to each other. Katherine possessed exactly the qualities which were most painfully lacking in her lover; a strong understanding, good-nature, and an acute sense of humour. It may be conjectured that, if anybody could have brought him back to the Church of England and the hearts of his future subjects, it was the daughter of his brother's boon companion, and it is at least probable that, if she had been his wife, he might have retained his crown for himself and his descendants. It was "Dorinda's" tragedy that, herself the child of a

¹ There are many versions of this witticism. The above is from G. E. C.'s "Complete Peerage" (ed. Vicary Gibbs), IV. 407 n., where it is quoted from Lord Orford, IV. 319. It seems to have inspired the following lines by the Earl of Dorset, first published in Gildon's "New Miscellany" (8vo, 1701, p. 94):

"Sylvia, methinks you are unfit
For your great Lord's embrace;
For tho' we all allow you Wit,
We can't a handsome Face.
Then where's the Pleasure, where's the Good,
Of spending Time and Cost?
For if your Wit be'n't understood,
Your Keeper's Bliss is lost."

² G. E. C., "Peerage" (ed. Vicary Gibbs), IV. 407 n.

marriage of expediency, she was destined to find her ¹⁶⁷⁸ only road to happiness and the salvation of her lover barred by a union similar to that which gave her birth.

While the Duke was making love to her, Mrs. Sedley appears to have been taking music lessons from Henry Bowman, a well-known contemporary composer. A book of songs with her book-plate and the date 1678¹ is preserved in the British Museum. It appears to be in Bowman's writing, and includes a number of religious pieces in Latin and some drinking songs, among which is her father's Bacchanalian verses beginning:

"Drinke about till the day finde us,
These are pleasures which endure."²

Doubtless she sang the Latin anthems to her pious lover and the drinking songs to her jovial father. On 4 March, 1679, Charles II was forced to send his ¹⁶⁷⁹ brother to the Continent on account of the fury of public opinion against his religion and politics. Before his departure, it was known at Whitehall that Katherine Sedley had become a mother.³ The child was a girl, and was baptised by the name Katherine. James appears to have acknowledged his paternity at once,

¹ Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 30, 382. The date 1678 is written very faintly in pencil on the book-plate, which is the family coat-of-arms, with the printed inscription, "Katherine Sedley, sole daughter and heyre of S^r Charles Sedley of Southfleet Baronet."

² Works, 1702, p. 44. The leaf of the music-book containing the first stanzas (pp. 89, 90) is torn out: p. 91 contains the last lines from "Joyning thus our mirth & Beauty."

³ Peter Le Neve's MS. Diary in the possession of Mr. G. Thorn Drury, s.d. "Mars 7, Veneris 1678/9." "I heard that the only daughter and heir of Sir Charles Sedley baronet being reputed a Maid was brought to bed of a child and layd it to ye D. of York, before he went beyond the seas; which together with the thought of departing out of England made his Dutchess very melancholy." A contemporary satirist (possibly Dorset) celebrated the event in the following couplet:

"Poor Sidley's Fall, ev'n her own Sex deplore,
Who wth so small Temptation turn'd thy whore."

A Faithful Catalogue of our Most Eminent Ninnies (Harl. MS. 7319, f. 473).

1679 and the title "Lady" and the surname "Darnley" were conferred on the child by letters patent. Nevertheless, it is not certain that he was the real father of the child. Colonel James Grahame, or Grahme, second son of Sir George Grahame of Netherby, Bart., and Keeper of the Privy Purse to the Duke of York, was known to be very intimate with Mrs. Sedley, and a striking likeness was afterwards observed between Katherine Darnley and Grahame's legitimate daughter, the Countess of Berkshire and Suffolk. According to Horace Walpole, Katherine Sedley used to say to her daughter: "You need not be so proud, for you are not the King's but old Graham's daughter," while Grahame himself remarked concerning the Countess of Berkshire and Katherine Darnley: "Well, well, kings are great men, they make free with whom they please. All I can say is that I am sure the same man begot these two women."¹

Sir Charles Sedley is said to have been "greatly shocked"² when he heard of his daughter's seduction, though he could hardly have expected any other result from the training which she had received. He probably decided at this time to leave the bulk of his estate to Ann Ayscough's son, and it is also possible that his grievance against the Duke of York helped to drive him into the ranks of the Whig or "Country Party," of which his friend the Earl of Dorset was a prominent member.

¹ Horace Walpole's Letters, ed. Toynbee, I. 332 n.

² Cibber's Lives of the Poets (1753). "Biographia Britannica," s.a. Sedley (1747-66). Lampoons of the grossest kind were written on Katherine's relations with the Duke. The following is a specimen from "The Ladies March," a MS. satire on the ladies of the Court:

"Lo thy Daughter, little Sid,
She who lately slip'd her Kid,
Sure a hopefull 'twill be Soaked in Pox and Popery."

(Harl. MS. 7317, f. 31.)

CHAPTER VII

THE END OF THE SOCIETY OF WITS

"Oh, Dog and Partridge, thou hast cause to mourn;
Thy Darling Son is from thy Bosom torn;
Sidley is gone and never will return.

Lesse were thy joys and expectations crost
In Strephon's Death, then now when Sidleys lost."
Charles Montague: MS. Satire on Sir C. Sedley
(Add. MS. 28,644).

"Witty Dorchester next, like a Queen took her place,
And brag'd she a Monarch subdu'd to her Arms.
If Jove in a Shower does court my embrace
Can Adonis deny to submit to my charms?"
"The Session of Ladies" (Harl. MS. 7319, f. 564).

"And Sedley curs'd the form that pleas'd a king."
Dr. Johnson: "The Vanity of Human Wishes."

THE last records of the Society of Wits before death, repentance and exile put an end to its joyous existence belong to the years 1678-80. In the former year its chief members paid a graceful act of homage to a neglected and unhappy genius. On leaving Oxford, John Oldham, the son of a dissenting minister, had been prevented by his religious opinions and independent spirit from taking orders, then the usual resource of impecunious men of letters who had no vocation for the drama. Instead, he became an usher at Croydon Grammar School in 1674, and it was probably while ¹⁶⁷⁴ occupying that post that he wrote his earliest poems.¹ Some of these verses seem to have circulated in manuscript, and to have come to the notice of Sir Charles

¹ Probably not the mordant "Satyrs on the Jesuits" (which are said in the first edition to have been written in 1679). The earliest poems which are dated in the Collected Edition of 1703 (8vo) belong to the years 1676, '77 and '78.

Sedley and his friends. The powerful "Ode upon Ben Jonson"¹ and the amusing "Dithyrambick" or Drunkard's Speech² would probably make a special appeal to such judges. One day in 1678,³ Rochester, Sedley, and Dorset are said to have driven over to Croydon School to pay a surprise visit to the young poet. The headmaster received them under the mistaken impression that these dazzling figures had left Whitehall in order to visit him. When he was undeceived, he was considerably surprised that his usher should have had such attractions for the great. Whether any material gain came to Oldham from this visit is not recorded. In the same year (1678) he became tutor to the grandsons of Sir Edward Thurland, the judge. It is not unlikely that it was through the Wits that Oldham was introduced to Dryden, who mourned the death of this Marcellus of Restoration Satire in a burst of unusually moving and majestic music.

Oldham was not the only aspirant to literary fame who received help from the Wits about this time. Another of their protégés was destined to attain to a far greater celebrity. This was Matthew Prior, the nephew of the landlord of the Rummer Tavern at Charing Cross, where Dorset found him one day translating Horace.⁴ His exquisite art was in many ways a continuation and development of Sedley's lyrical vein, and it can scarcely be doubted that Sir Charles as well as his friend Dorset was among his early patrons.⁵

1678/79 In March 1678/9, Sir Charles was probably present at the production of "A True Widow," an excellent comedy by his friend Shadwell, staged at the fine

¹ Dated 1678 in the edition of 1703.

² Dated 1677 in the edition of 1703.

³ Memoir prefixed to "The Works of Mr. John Oldham: Together with his Remains," etc., 2 vols. in 8vo, 1770: Vol. I. p. v.

⁴ Voltaire, "Lettres Philosophiques," Lettre XXII, "Sur M. Pope et quelques autres poètes fameux."

⁵ Bickley's "Life of Matthew Prior" (Pitman), London, 1914, p. 11. That Prior knew Sedley well is proved by the reference in his "Session of the Poets" quoted on p. 283.

theatre in Dorset Garden. The quarto edition of the 1678/79 play (1679) is dedicated to the Baronet in an epistle in which the author frankly admits that his work has "had the benefit" of Sir Charles's "correction and alteration." The same epistle gives a glimpse of the merry evenings which Sedley must have often spent in Shadwell's company about this time. According to the dramatist, he was heard "to speak more wit at a supper than all my adversaries with their heads joined together can write in a year." Another interesting personal note in this epistle tells us that Shadwell had received many "obligations" and "favours" from Sedley. Probably the author of "A True Widow," who admittedly lived by his pen, ate many a hearty meal and drank many a pint of wine at Sir Charles's expense, nor is it likely that he was above accepting a timely offering of guineas in the intervals between his precarious earnings at the theatres. Dryden, it may be noticed, wrote the Prologue to "A True Widow" and must have been friendly with both Shadwell and Sedley at this time. There must have been some good talk at the Rose when Sir Charles supped there with the authors of "All for Love" and "Epsom Wells." A dramatic collaboration of the old Elizabethan type between the three might have produced very interesting results, for each had literary qualities that the others lacked. A play which combined Dryden's brilliant artistry with Sedley's wit and distinction and Shadwell's full-blooded realism would surely have held no mean place in English literature. It is sad to remember the bitter feud which was to break out a few months later and render such a collaboration impossible for ever so far as Dryden and Shadwell were concerned.

The twilight was now drawing in on the original company of Wits. Etherege, indeed, remained true to the spirit of the fraternity, and was to preserve the character of a Restoration gentleman to the end, but the diplomatic missions which form such an incongruous close to his career took him frequently away 1678/79 from London. Rochester, whose constitution had been wrecked by his wild life, had "bin at the gates of death" in April 1678, and was "so penitent that he said he would be an exsample of penitence to the whole world."¹ Buckhurst, now Earl of Dorset and Middlesex, was happily married, and Sedley, under the influence of Ann Ayscough, was fast becoming a respectable character. In 1679 the whole fraternity were savagely attacked by John Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave, in a scurrilous lampoon entitled "An Essay Upon Satyr." Mulgrave, a man with hardly a tincture of real wit or literary talent, had been a sort of hanger-on of the group, and had quarrelled violently with Rochester. His squib, which was circulated in 1679 in manuscript, was printed 1679-80 anonymously in 1680,² and was attributed to Dryden, whom Rochester had treated very badly. Although the evidence is not very clear, it seems that the Earl revenged himself for the supposed insult by means of the famous Rose Alley Ambuscade, in which Dryden was waylaid and cudgelled by some ruffians in an alley off the Strand. There is no evidence that Sedley had any connection with this outrage, and it is to be hoped that his friendship with the Laureate was not interrupted by the publication of the poem, which was commonly attributed to Dryden. Certainly he would have been justified in feeling resentment—not against Dryden, but against Mulgrave. His "character" in the Essay runs as follows :

"And little Sid-y for Simile renown'd,
Pleasure has always sought, but never found:
Tho' all his Thoughts on Wine and Women fall,
His are so bad sure he ne're thinks at all.

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., 12th Report, Appendix V. Pt. II. p. 50. (Lady Chaworth to Lord Roos, 23 April, 1678.)

² Term Catalogues, ed. Arber, I. 385. I have never seen the edition of 1680. According to the half-title of the poem in 'The Works of John Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave,' etc. (8vo, 1723), it was written in 1675. Rochester wrote to Savile in November 1679, that it was then circulating in manuscript (letter quoted in Scott's "Life of Dryden," ed. 1821, p. 203).

The Flesh he lives upon is rank and strong,
 His Meat and Mistresses are kept too long;
 But sure we all mistake this Pious man,
 Who mortifies his Person all he can:
 What we uncharitably take for Sin,
 Are only Rules of this old Capuchin,¹
 For never Hermit under grave pretence
 Has liv'd so contrary to common sense;
 And 'tis a miracle we may suppose,
 No nastiness offends his skilful Nose;
 Which from all stink can with peculiar Art,
 Extract Perfume, and Essence, from a F—t;
 Expecting Supper is his great delight,
 He toils all day but to be drunk at night:
 Then o'er his Cups this night-bird chirping sits,
 Till he takes Hewet and Jack Hall for wits."²

1679-80

What we know of Sedley enables us to annotate this brutal passage. The statement that his "mistresses are kept too long" is certainly a reference to his connection with Miss Ayscough, with whom he had now lived for seven years, which must have seemed a miracle of constancy to Mulgrave. The comment on Sedley's "piety" is doubtless a sneer at the reformation in his manners which was now in progress. Of the two persons mentioned in the last line as the Baronet's drinking companions, "Hewet" is probably Sir John Hewitt, prince of Restoration coxcombs and the alleged original of ¹ Cf. "Satyr to His Muse." By the Author of "Absalom and Achitophel." . . . (London, 1682. 4to) p. 5.

"Adriel to please, call Rochester a Fool, Sidley a Capuchin, and sharp Dorset Dull."

² This is the text printed in "The Fourth and Last Collection of Poems, Satyrs, Songs, etc. (4to, 1689) and is, I believe, the earliest extant printed version. In the Term Catalogues for 1680 an octavo edition of "An Essay upon Satyr or a Poem on the Times. . . . Printed for T. Dring in Fleet Street" is entered, but no copy seems to be now extant. It was reprinted in the "Poems on State Affairs" of 1697 (I. 195) with practically no variants. A widely differing version appeared in the Quarto Edition of Sheffield's Works of 1725. There can be little doubt that "Sid-y" refers to Sedley. In the Brit. Mus. copy it is filled up as "Sidley" in MS., and the couplet quoted above from "Satyr to His Muse" is a strong support of this interpretation, although it should be mentioned that in some copies of the "Poems on State Affairs" the name is expanded in MS. to "Sidney."

1680 Etherege's Sir Fopling Flutter. The allusion to "Jack Hall" is more obscure. A Puritan poet of some merit called John Hall died in 1656,¹ and a Dr. John Hall became Bishop of Bristol in 1691,² but it is hardly likely that Mulgrave refers to either of these persons. It is more tempting to suppose that "Hall" is a printer's error for "Howe," and that the person referred to is Jack Howe, the dissolute scribbler and politician, notorious for his violent speeches in the Parliaments of William III. Howe is said to have been "an amorous spark of the Court" in his young days, and to have written some savage lampoons.³ His character would fit in very well with the sense of this context.

In the following winter there occurred an accident which seems to have contributed a good deal towards Sir Charles's conversion, though it nearly cut short the career of the convert. One day in the early part of January, Sedley, Etherege, Fleetwood Shepherd and others were warming themselves with some setts of their favourite tennis in a Court in Peter Street, Clare Market,⁴ when the roof of the building collapsed and buried the whole company in its ruins. Both Etherege and Sedley were severely hurt, the latter receiving such serious injuries to the skull that he was at first supposed to be dead. The newspapers published notices to this effect,⁵ one adding a short but significant eulogy.⁶ The news reached Anthony à Wood at Oxford very rapidly, and he entered the incident in his Diary on 13 January,

¹ D. N. B., s.a. John Hall.

² Luttrell's "Brief Relation," II. 246.

³ D. N. B., s.a. John Howe, Macaulay's "History of England," ed. Firth, III. 1336.

⁴ Clare Market lay between Lincoln's Inn Fields and the Strand. Peter Street was sometimes called Denzell Street after Denzell Hollis, Lord Clare (Wheatley's "London Past and Present").

⁵ "True Domestic Intelligence," 16 January, 1679/80; "The True News, or Mercurius Anglicus," January 14/17, 1679/80. See also "Hatton, Correspondence," ed. Camden Soc., I. 216.

⁶ "True News," etc. January 14/17. "A Person of ancient descent and no less admired for his wit and admirable parts."

adding the following amazing note: "he (Sedley) died a 1680 week later; he left his estate to his natural son and £10,000 to his owne daughter."¹ It may be noticed that the provision made for Katherine according to Wood tallies exactly with the sum mentioned by Lady Chaworth when she wrote to Lord Roos that Mrs. Sedley was engaged to "Sir Hungerford" in 1677.

Sir Charles was not dead, and the newspapers had to publish disclaimers,² while Wood scored out the news of the Baronet's death in his Diary, and added the quaint note, "alive again quære." The resurrection was signalised characteristically by a witticism. Sir Fleetwood Shepherd, perhaps when visiting the invalid after the accident, remarked that "there was so much fire in his (Sedley's) play that it blew up poet, house and all." Sedley replied, "No, the play was so heavy that it broke down the house and buried the poet in the ruins."³

¹ Anthony à Wood's "Life and Times," etc., ed. A. Clarke, II. 477.

² "True Domestic Intelligence," 20 January 1679/80; "True News, or Mercurius Anglicus," 1721 January, 1679/80.

³ I follow Haslewood in restoring this witticism to its proper context. It was originally related by the author of "Some Account of Sir Charles Sedley" prefixed to the 1722 edition (see p. 5). He lays the scene in "the theatre" and makes the occasion of the witticism the collapse of the roof of the theatre at a performance of Sedley's "Bellamira." The anecdote has been repeated in subsequent memoirs in this form. However, as there is no record of the collapse of the roof of any English theatre during Sir Charles's lifetime, and as such an event would certainly have attracted attention, it is certain that the tale in the form in which it appears in the 1722 edition is apocryphal. On the other hand, as we know that Sedley was actually injured by the collapse of a roof—not of a theatre but of a tennis court—it seems extremely probable that the witticism, if genuine, was uttered on that occasion. The author of the "Account" probably picked up the anecdote at a tavern or coffee-house, and was either misled by his informant or deliberately embellished it. It may be noticed that the word "play," both in Sir Fleetwood's remark and Sir Charles's rejoinder, is taken to mean "comedy." It could, however, be understood perfectly well in the sense of "game" (viz. tennis). See J. Haslewood's pseudonymous article on Sedley in the Gentleman's Magazine of 1822 (cf. p. 9) and his MS. notes on Jacob's "Poetical Register," Appendix I, pp. 320–23.

1680 The serious illness which, doubtless, followed this accident seems to have had a very natural result of turning Sir Charles's thoughts towards religion, and it may be conjectured that the good Dr., Burnet, then engaged in his famous reclamation of Rochester, did not fail to improve the occasion by visiting the penitent.¹ Rochester died at Adderbury on 26 July, 1680, in the odour of sanctity, and, if Sedley had sufficiently recovered, it may be supposed that he was present at his friend's death-bed, and was deeply influenced by his conversion. The carnival of the Restoration was, indeed, at an end when the prince of the lewd Wits turned to Burnet for consolation, and died an exemplary Christian.

It is to be hoped that Sir Charles's health and newly-discovered conscience allowed him to attend the first performance of John Crowne's vigorous tragedy, entitled "The First Part of Henry VI, or the Murder of the Duke of Gloucester," produced at the Duke's 1681 House in September 1681. The first edition of this play² is dedicated to Sedley in a long epistle of a very "True Blue" and anti-Catholic character. This epistle contains the following passage, which furnishes definite proof that Sedley had recently joined the Whigs—or, as they loved to call themselves, the party of liberty and property:—"It would be foolish to lash out into unnecessary praises of a Wit that has so long been the delight and ornament of the Nation and is now become the Defence of what is very dear to it, Truth, Liberty, and Property." The tragedy itself is deeply tinged with

¹ Cf. Montague's MS. satire on Sedley's conversion (see pp. 166–68 below and Appendix I, pp. 311–14):

"Sidley He started once and did return again,
But now his ears are bored by his own pen.
When the old tennis court fell on his back,
Tho his soul fluttered and the Goose cried Quak,
Devotion by compulsion is but short . . ."

² 4to, London, 1681.

anti-“papist” feeling, as the following typical passage 1681 shows:

“Enter Cardinal with three Murderers.

Card. So you have all sworn at the holy Altars;
Now have a care, don't let your Consciences
Fool you, to flinch with fear e'er it is done,
Or to repent and tell when 'tis done;
If so you are doubly Damned.

1st Murd.

I warrant your Grace.

Card. Believe your Priests, and not your Consciences,
For Priests are to direct your Consciences;
Your consciences are silly, false, corrupt.”¹

That Sedley should have consented to patronise such a work is in itself strong evidence that he was now a supporter of the ultra-Protestant party.

On 5 August, 1682, occurs one of the few references to Sedley in the contemporary press. On this date, Curtis's Protestant Mercury, one of the crop of short-lived Whig newspapers which flourished at the time of the Exclusion Bill, printed the following advertisement:

“Tobias Floyd, a middle-sized man, a black bushy hair; the two middle fingers of both his hands are a little shorter than usual, and a little lame in one of his legs at present: was footman to Sir Charles Sedley and is ran away from his master with 19 guineys and a mixt green cloth coat, lined with scarlet shag, spotted with black: whoever apprehends him or gives such Intelligence of him to Sir Charles Sedley at his house in Bloomesberry Square, whereby he may be apprehended, shall have 40s. reward.”

Whether Tobias was ever apprehended and whether Sir Charles ever recovered his “19 guineys” and “mixt green cloth coat” are historical problems which are not likely to be solved. However, apart from Tobias

¹ “Henry VI, The First Part,” etc., Act IV. (4to, 1681).

1681 and his shortcomings, the advertisement contains two points of interest to a biographer of Sir Charles Sedley. The first is its appearance in a journal of very strong Whig tendencies, which helps to confirm the conjecture that Sedley had definitely joined the opposition to the Court. Secondly, it gives us the interesting information that Sedley was now living in Bloomsbury Square. The exact date of his removal from Great Queen Street is not recorded, but it may be suspected that, after the departure of Lady Sedley, he was not particularly anxious to remain in the neighbourhood of the Savages. It has already been observed that, at the time of Father Bede's visit, husband and wife seem to have been living apart, and it may be supposed that after the "marriage" of April 1672, Sir Charles definitely installed himself with Ann Ayscough in Bloomsbury Square, where he continued to live until just before the end of his life.

In the reign of Charles II people of quality were just beginning to leave the neighbourhood of the Strand and Whitehall, and to live in what were then the suburbs. The oldest of the London squares, St. James's Square and Bloomsbury Square, were originally part of this new suburban development. Bloomsbury Square was at first called Southampton Square after its original owner, the Earl of Southampton, who, according to Evelyn, was engaged in the winter of 1663/4¹ in building "a noble square or Piazza, a little town," in Bloomsbury. One side was occupied by his own mansion, which Evelyn considered "too low," but which "had some noble rooms, a pretty cedar Chapel and a naked garden to the North." This square or piazza was regarded by Londoners with considerable pride, and foreign visitors, like the Grand Duke Cosmo of Florence, were carried to see it as one of the lions of the metropolis. To judge from a print of the early eighteenth century,² it must indeed have been a pleasant place. The centre was occupied by a noble stretch of 1681 turf with intersecting diagonal pathways, but, unlike a modern London square, without a single tree. On three sides were neat terraces of houses, each built round an interior courtyard like the older houses in Paris to-day. Two of these terraces were called Allington (?Arlington) Row and Seymour Row, doubtless after Lord Arlington and Sir Edward Seymour, who probably lived in them or leased them. On the north side was the long, low structure of Southampton House, and, over its chimneys and the trees that surrounded it, the two green hills of Hampstead and Highgate could be clearly seen. Indeed, there were no houses beyond the single row which extended on either side of Southampton House, the gardens of which looked on to the open fields, whence the fresh country airs must have been wafted through the windows of the houses in the square. No record survives to inform us of the exact position of Sir Charles Sedley's house. He had some distinguished neighbours, among whom were Richard Baxter, the gentle and learned Nonconformist divine, and the second Earl of Chesterfield, whom he had long ago lampooned, when the Duke of York was pursuing the pretty Countess. That Chesterfield bore no rancour, and that any coolness caused by Sedley's squibs had long been forgotten, is proved by an interesting letter written by Sir Charles to the Earl in August 1682. It 1682 is the earliest extant specimen of Sedley's correspondence, and its racy, gossiping style makes us regret that so few of his letters survive.¹ On 29 November, 1679, Chesterfield had been appointed "Warden and Lord Chief Justice in Eyre on this side of the Trent." At the ¹ We owe the survival of this letter to the meticulous care with which Chesterfield kept copies of his correspondence. A letter-book, which is not in his own hand, is now in the British Museum (Add. MS. 19,253). Sedley's letter is on ff. 121b and 122. Chesterfield's Correspondence was printed very incorrectly in 1820 under the title of "The Letters of Philip Earl of Chesterfield." I have printed the text of the British Museum MS.

¹ Evelyn, Diary, ed. Dobson, II. 223.

² Reproduced in Macaulay's "History of England," ed. Firth, I. 345.

1682 time when he received this letter he had, apparently, been recently in London, and had offered Sir Charles a buck, which the Baronet had refused. Sir Charles now writes to ask whether the offer still stands good.

“ From Sir Charles Sedley, 1682.

“ MY LORD,

“ When your Lordship was last in town you made mee an offer of some venison, which I did not then lay hold off, having no occasion, neither was it then in season, but now I would thank you for a Buck, tho the town is so empty that with all my bowling, Tennis, drinking and other generall acquaintance, I shall have much ado to find company for a Pasty: besides the distinction of Whigg and Tory doth much add to the present desolation, they are in my opinion (at least the violent part on both sides) much of the same stuff at bottom since they are so easily converted one to another, I mean self interest; for instance the Lord Sunderland upon the Dutches of Portsmouth's arrivall is recejved at Court: the Lord Anglesey was voted a Libellour and his book against the Duke of Ormond a libell at the Councill: so tis thought he will be three Quarters Whigg. The Lord Vaughan is this week to be Marryd to the Lady Ann savile notwithstanding he voted her father an enemy to King and country last Sessions. Tho wee are not blest with Poets that can write us comedys equall to the auntients, I beleive never was any age so comical as this, and a Laughter where ever he turns himself will have occasion to hold his sides: Madam de Soyssons is arrived whom the lord Craves were he alive would call Madame de Soyxante, for she is ten years older than her sister Mazarin, but whether our Court will have her a beauty, a Mis, a Wit or a pollition, is not yet known.

“ Ruinous play is grown the only diversion at 1682 Windsor, and a man without a thousand Guineys to venture, is an Asse, and on the contrary, as it has ever been the Custome of people of Quality that had infirmities, to introduce fashions that might hide them, soe they now cover up their want of sence and conversation with extravagant play. some considerable removes are to be made at Court, but what they are your Lordship can not but know before mee, so I will not trouble you with my conjectures. I could wish England were not so large, that it might fall within my diocess to visit your Lordship, for I know no man I would speak more freely to, nor more willing hear then your Lordship. being without compliment or any regard to the common close of a letter your very

“ Obedient servant.”

Sir Charles seems to have received his buck, to judge from the Earl’s reply, which runs as follows :

“ SR,

“ You can not oblige mee more than by commanding anything that is within my power and I hope you will never doubt of my readiness to serve you. I have written to my secretaire to prepare a warrant which shall be sent you by the first oportunity and I shall be glad of any occation to assure you of my respects. As to the newse you mention, it may well seem strange to one who lives in the Country, since it is the wonder of the Towne, but I have long thought this Kingdom the Iland of uncertainty, though I am sure no change can make me more or less than I am,

Sr,

Your, &c.”

It is pleasant to learn from Sir Charles’s letter that he had sufficiently recovered, both in body and in 1682 spirits, to consort again with his "bowling, Tennis, drinking and other generall acquaintance." The "newse" which he relates for the Earl's diversion throws some interesting sidelights on contemporary history, and helps us to date the letter. The "Lord Sunderland" is the crafty and fickle Robert Spencer, second Earl of Sunderland, who supported the Bill to exclude James, Duke of York, from the succession to the throne. All through that stormy period he acted in close conjunction with Louise de K  roualle, Duchess of Portsmouth, the King's mistress, who, at first, also intrigued on behalf of the Whigs. Sunderland's name was struck off the list of Privy Councillors in February 1681, and he was not formally restored to favour till 28 August, 1682, when the Duchess of Portsmouth succeeded in persuading the King to allow him to kiss his hand.¹ It must be to this reconciliation that Sedley refers, and it is thus almost certain that the letter was written about the end of August. "Lord Anglesey" is Arthur Annesley, first Earl, an old Roundhead peer who fought for the Parliament in Ireland during the Civil War. He had supported the Restoration, and held office under Charles II. The book mentioned by Sedley is his "Letter from a Person of Honour in the Countrey,"² containing his "Animadversions" upon the Earl of Castlehaven's Memoirs. This pamphlet contains passages which reflect both on Ormonde's administration of Ireland and on Charles I. Charles II was deeply offended, and, on 8 August, Anglesey was called upon to resign his office of Lord Privy Seal.³ Lord Vaughan, afterwards Earl of Carberry, is the person to whom Pepys had compared Sedley as "one of the lewdest fellows of the age." He was a friend and patron of Dryden, who dedicated his comedy "Limberham" to him in 1678. His second marriage to Ann Savile, daughter of the great Marquis 1682 of Halifax, to which Sedley here refers, took place in August 1681.¹ Halifax had actively opposed the Exclusion Bill, and the Whig House of Commons in 1680 had addressed the King to remove him from his Council and presence for ever. Madame de Soissons is the beautiful Olympe Mancini, niece of Cardinal Mazarin, and sister of the Duchesse de Mazarin. Her husband, the Comte de Soissons, had been Ambassador Extraordinary from Louis XIV at the coronation of Charles II. Her brilliant and sensational career at Louis XIV's Court was cut short by the revelations of La Voisin in the notorious "drame des poisons," when she was accused of having plotted to poison her rival, Louise de la Vallière. In 1679 she was given the choice of going to the Bastille or leaving France. She chose the latter alternative and retired to Brussels. According to her latest English biographer,² she is said to have visited "Hamburg and other parts of Western Germany." Neither this author nor her French biographers³ mention a visit to England. Sir Charles Sedley's statement is, however, confirmed by Narcissus Luttrell, who on 27 July, 1682, notes that "the dutchesse of Soissons, sister of the dutchesse of Mazarine, is daily expected here."⁴ The nickname, "Madame de Soy-xante," is unfair to Olympe. She was only forty-three in 1682. The "lord Crafes" is Sedley's spelling of Lord Crofts, his merry old drinking companion at Saxham Parva in 1668.⁵

¹ D. N. B., s.a. Robert Spencer, Earl of Sunderland.

² See Bibliography under Annesley, Arthur, first Earl of Anglesey.

³ D. N. B., s.a. Arthur Annesley, first Earl of Anglesey.

There are few records of Sir Charles Sedley in the last years of the reign of Charles II. This is natural when it is remembered that after Shaftesbury's flight and death, and the complete triumph of the Court,

¹ D. N. B., s.a. Robert Spencer, second Earl of Sunderland.

² H. Noel Williams, "Five Fair Sisters," London (Hutchinson), 1906.

³ E.g. "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," Firmin Didot, Paris, 1865.

⁴ Luttrell's "Brief Relation," I. 209.

⁵ See p. 109.

1682 persons who had shown Whig or Exclusionist sympathies found it wise to keep quiet. Sir Charles was probably protected by the influence of his daughter over the Duke of York, but his intimacy with members of the party opposed to the Court must have been well known. In 1684 he contributed to a miscellany edited by Dryden, and it is pleasant to deduce from this fact that political differences had not interfered with his friendship with the great poet. Meanwhile, Katherine Sedley continued to strengthen her empire over the pious James, much to the chagrin of his beautiful young wife. In 1680,¹ Dorset had again lampooned her in verses that satirise her fading natural charms and her love of finery :

“Tell me, Dorinda, why so gay,
Why such embroid’ry, fringe, and lace?
Can any dresses find a way,
To stop th’ approaches of decay,
And mend a ruin’d face?

Wilt thou still sparkle in the box,
Still ogle in the ring?
Canst thou forget thy age and pox?
Can all that shines on shells and rocks
Make thee a fine young Thing?

So have I seen in larder dark
Of veal a lucid loin;
Replete with many a brilliant spark,
As wise philosophers remark,
At once both stink and shine.”²

As Maid of Honour to the Duchess of York, Dorinda had formerly lived in Whitehall Palace, but, since her liaison with the Duke, she had established herself in “a little apartment in sight of the Court.” During the last years of Charles II she had become very intimate with Louise de K roualle, Duchess of Portsmouth, and had been a great favourite with the King, whom she often met in the Duchess's apartments, and who took a keen delight in her wit.¹ In September 1684 she bore a second child to the Duke of 1684 York.² It was a boy and received the names of James Darnley.

¹ This date occurs in the half-title of the poem in all the printed copies.

² Poems by the Earl of Dorset, “Works of the Minor Poets,” 8vo, London, 1749, I. 131.

In the following winter a momentous change came over Whitehall. One Sunday evening at the end of January 1684/5, John Evelyn saw King Charles II for 1684/85 the last time "in that glorious gallery," surrounded by the dissolute and voluptuous courtiers among whom Sir Charles Sedley had squandered so much of his time and money. Six days later the King was dead and "all was in the dust."³ Probably, like most Englishmen, Sedley mourned sincerely for the dead King, whose temperament had much in common with his own, while the accession of the gloomy, priest-ridden James must have filled him with apprehension.

The High Sheriff of Kent proclaimed King James with great pomp at Bromley on 10 February. Sedley, as one of the chief landowners in the county, was probably present at this ceremony, and drank the new King's health "in a flint glass of a yard long"⁴—with some mental reservations. James had already made a great show of purifying the Court from the loose living for which it had been notorious under his brother. Yielding to his wife and the priests, he sent a message to Katherine Sedley a few days after his brother's death to the following effect: "reflecting upon the ¹ Barillon, 7 February, 1686 (see Appendix II).

² See p. 159, note 1. Was it Katherine's second child? Dangeau, the French diarist, states on 27 March, 1686 (N.S.), that King James had two sons by the Countess of Dorchester, "at present being educated in Paris" (Journal, Firmin Didot, Paris, 1854, I. 303-4). There is no other trace, as far as I know, of these other sons, so perhaps Dangeau was mistaken.

³ Evelyn's Diary, ed. Dobson, III. 145.

⁴ Ibid.

1684/85 frailty of mankind by the example of his brother, he has resolved to lead another kind of life, and therefore if she should either go out of England or retire privately in the country she should be competently provided for, but that he would see her no more.”¹ Katherine was so sure of her hold over her lover that she seems to have refused to listen to these suggestions. Her very slight personal charms, which, so far as can be judged from contemporary portraits, consisted chiefly of finely modelled arms and bust, had by now nearly completely disappeared, and she is said to have become very thin at the time of James’s accession.² Her wit and intellect, however, seem to have been unimpaired. As an attempt to compromise the divergence between his suggestion that she should go into exile and her determination to stay at Court, James bought her a fine house in St. James’s Square, for which he is said to have paid ten thousand pounds, doubtless in the hope that she might be induced to spend her time there instead of flaunting her finery in the eyes of the scandalised Catholics at Whitehall. The finest sculptors and painters in London are said to have been employed to adorn this mansion, and, in addition, Mrs. Sedley received a large pension out of the Privy Purse.³ In spite of these bribes, she continued to appear at Court, though for three months James kept his promise to his wife by abstaining from visiting her in private. At the end of this period temptation proved too strong for the pupil of the Jesuits, and it became known at Court that Chiffinch’s secret room, which had seen such strange sights in the reign of Charles II, was now being used again, this time by King James and the daughter of Sir Charles Sedley. It is possible that the King may have felt some remorse on the death of

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., Ormonde MSS., N.S., VII. 323. (Sir C. Wyche to D. of Ormonde, 7 February, 1684/5.)

² Barillon, 7 February, 1686 (see Appendix III, p. 355).

³ Ibid.

Katherine's son, James Darnley, which took place on 1684/85 23 April, the day of his father's coronation.¹ The death of this child was one of several ominous incidents which occurred on that day, and which were afterwards remembered by the superstitious.

The King's confidants in his relations with Mrs. 1685 Sedley were Colonel Grahame of Kendal, the Keeper of the Privy Purse, and a "Mrs. Bocky,"² usually known at Court as Mrs. Sophy. Grahame,³ it will be remembered, was an old friend of Katherine, and very probably the King's successful rival. Far more powerful persons than these are said to have encouraged the meetings between the King and his mistress. The Protestant section of the Ministry, headed by Lawrence Hyde, now Earl of Rochester and Lord Treasurer, was seriously alarmed at the growing influence of the extreme Catholic party. Remembering how Louis XIV had used Louise de K roualle, they formed the design of employing Katherine Sedley as an instrument to counteract the designs of the Jesuits. The choice was a clever one, for Katherine loved to exercise her wit at the expense of the priests, while the King's love for her was almost as strong a passion as his ardour for the Church. Macaulay in a well-known passage⁴ has described the extraordinary spectacle of the pious Earl and Countess of Rochester and the high-minded Duke of Ormond acting as panders in order to serve what they conceived to be the interests of their religion. Lady Rochester seems to have gone so far as to have

¹ Burnet, "Original Memoirs," ed. Foxcroft, p. 150. Also unofficial Register of Westminster Abbey, "1685, April 26, A male child buried in Henry 7th Chapel, in the middle, between the stalls." On an examination of the royal vaults in 1868, a coffin plate was found with the following inscription: "James Darnley naturall son to King James ye second Departed this life the 22 April 1685 Aged about eight Months."

² So Barillon calls her. See Appendix III, p. 353.

³ Barillon, 3 January, 1686 (see Appendix III, p. 353).

⁴ "History of England," ed. Firth, II. 726.

1685 attempted to divert the Queen's suspicions of Katherine by the ignoble expedient of "insinuating" that the King's real favourite was Mrs. Grafton, one of the Maids of Honour, and thus causing this perfectly innocent girl to lose the confidence of her mistress.

It must be admitted that, according to her lights, Katherine worked hard for the Protestant cause. In the months when it was almost as dangerous to criticise the Government as in the reign of Henry VIII, she told the King to his face what many of his subjects were thinking, but what nobody dared to whisper. In one of these outspoken conversations, she made the prophetic remark to her lover that Arundel and Tyrconnel would lose him his crown. It was the very completeness of her triumph in her battle with the Queen and the priests that was to be the cause of her downfall. The King, in a fit of fondness, and doubtless acting on a momentary impulse to emulate his brother, determined to create his mistress a Countess in her own right. This resolution was probably taken in the middle of January 1685/86 1685/6.¹ The titles chosen were Countess of Dorchester and Baroness Darlington. The news threw the Court into an uproar, and it was commonly rumoured that the new Countess was going to be installed in the magnificent apartments formerly occupied by the Duchess of Portsmouth, and would henceforth occupy the almost official position that Louise de Kéroualle had held under Charles II.

James probably expected that, after a little murmuring, his wife would accept the presence of the new Countess at Court, as her predecessor had accepted that of the Duchess of Portsmouth. But Mary of Modena was a very different person from Katherine of Braganza. On 19 January, when the patent of Mrs. Sedley's title passed the Great Seal, John Evelyn was standing close to the royal table, and noticed that the 1685/86 Queen "ate scarcely a morsel nor spake one word to the King."¹ According to Burnet,² when the Queen heard the news (of Katherine's title) "she gave order to bring all the priests, that were admitted to a particular confidence, to her closet. And, when she had them about her, she sent to desire the King to come and speak to her. When he came, he was surprised to see such a company about her, but much more when they fell on their knees before him. And the Queen broke out into a bitter mourning for this new honour, which they expected would be followed with the setting her up openly as mistress. The Queen was then in an ill habit of body, and had an illness that as was thought would end in a consumption. And it was believed that her sickness was of such a nature, that it gave a very melancholy presage that, if she should live, she should have no children. The priests said to the King that a blemish in his life blasted their designs; and the more it appeared, and the longer it continued, the more ineffectual all their endeavours would be. The King was so much moved with this, and was out of countenance for what he had done. But to quiet them all he promised them he would see the lady no more, and pretended he gave her this title in order to be breaking with her more decently." These assurances failed to convince the Queen, and she told her husband that if the new Countess came to Court she would not receive her, and, unless she was really sent out of England, she herself would retire to a convent. James, who could never understand why anyone should oppose his desires, was genuinely surprised at this outburst, which, in his sublime conceit, he attributed "to her great love for himself."

¹ Barillon, 3 January, 1686. (Barillon uses the New Style. According to the Julian Calendar still in use in England, his letter would be dated 14 January, 1685/6.)

The Catholic faction at Court, headed by the unscrupulous Sunderland, now came to the rescue of the

¹ Diary, ed. Dobson, III. 197, s.d. 19 January, 1685/6.

² Burnet's "History of His Own Time" (ed. Oxford, 1833), II. 120.

1685/86 Queen and the priests. James listened to Father Gifford with respect when he admonished him for his conduct, but when Sunderland, Tyrconnel, Dover and Arundel presumed to add their voices to the priest's, he told them very shrewdly that he had taken what Father Gifford said kindly, as he recognised that he was doing his duty as a priest, but for their parts this was the first time he took them for divines, and was sure they spoke "not out of religion, but some private piques, and bid them for the future not concerne themselves with things that did noe way relate to them."¹ The "private piques" are, of course, an obvious reference to the jealousy shown by Sunderland and his friends toward the Hydes. Father Petre, the Jesuit priest, made a far more effective protest, pointing out that the whole Catholic world would be scandalised at the spectacle of a prince, who professed to be a champion of the faith, preferring an ugly, middle-aged, Protestant mistress to a beautiful young Catholic wife.

James bowed before the storm, and, in accordance with the tradition of his family, consented to sacrifice his favourite. The Queen's demands were that the new Countess should be dismissed from Court and sent away either to the country or out of England. But to dislodge a person of Katherine's strength of character was no easy matter. She made the King promise that he would never consent to be separated from her without granting her a parting interview. It was, perhaps, the memory of this promise (which was probably broken) that caused James to treat her with unusual patience. Her conduct was certainly impudent to the last degree. At first she flatly refused to move, and posed as a Protestant martyr oppressed by the Jesuits. Middleton, one of the most honourable men among James's ministers, was sent to inform her that a yacht was ready to take her to Holland.

¹ Belvoir MS., quoted by A. Fea in "James II and his Wives" (Methuen, London, 1908), p. 139.

Katherine replied in the language of a defender of constitutional rights, and invoked Magna Charta to support her contention that, as a British subject, she could not be deported without her own consent. Her resistance was so determined that it was whispered at Court that she received secret encouragement from the King. By January 28 she had consented to leave the Court and move into her luxurious lodgings in St. James's Square.¹ Her last resource was a real or pretended illness and miscarriage. France and Flanders were suggested as possible retreats, but she said that her friend the Duchesse de Mazarin had warned her never to go to a country where there were convents, and that she would prefer death to being shut up among nuns. Doubtless she was thinking of her unfortunate mother, who was at that very moment confined in a Flemish cloister. Finally, she proposed Ireland, but demanded at the same time that if Holland were chosen, she should be permitted to visit the Princess of Orange! She probably chose Ireland because part of the lands granted to her by the King were situated in that country. She is also said to have been friendly with a certain Lady W—— who lived there, and to have desired to settle with her.² After a long delay she finally departed about the middle of February 1685/6.³ Some letters written by her while she was in Ireland survive. They provide good examples of her wit and her original orthography, but are not complimentary to the land of her exile.⁴

It was rumoured as early as April 6, 1686, that Mrs. 1686 Sedley was going to return from Ireland. Her house in St. James's Square was said to be "furnishing very fine"

¹ Marquis of Downshire's MSS., Hist. MSS. Comm., 1924 (Dr. Owen Wynne to Sir W. Trumbull), p. 109.

² Ibid., p. 117.

³ Ibid., p. 122. News-letters dated 18 February: "The Countess of Dorchester hath begun the journey into Ireland."

⁴ They are printed and annotated in Appendix III of the present study: "Some Documents illustrative of the Life of Katherine Sedley, Countess of Dorchester" (pp. 345-52).

1686 on this date, and a pew in the new St. Anne's church had been taken for her.¹ She actually returned to England on 14 November, 1687.² She is said to have coolly appeared at Court on her return as if nothing had happened.

It was probably soon after her return that she purchased Ham House, Weybridge, from the widow of the sixth Duke of Norfolk. Here James is said to have visited her from time to time, though she never regained her old influence over him.³

While his daughter was waging her war of wit against the priests, Sir Charles Sedley seems to have continued to live the pleasant, leisurely life of a wealthy patron of literature. Soon after King James's accession, he and his friend Dorset were struck⁴ by the Latin and English verses in a collection published by graduates and other members of the University of Cambridge to lament the death of King Charles and to congratulate his successor.⁵ It may be noticed that this book contains "a Pindaric Ode" by William Ayloffe, Ann Ayscough's nephew, and perhaps it was this young man who brought the collection to Sedley's notice. Several other youths, who were destined to obtain celebrity, had contributed verses. There is a Latin epigram by Matthew Prior, who had been enabled by Dorset's generosity to go to St. John's College. But the best English verses

¹ "Ellis Correspondence," II. 92.

² "Clarendon Correspondence," ed. Singer, I. 544, 552. Some contemporaries were very sceptical about the journey to Ireland. Dr. Owen Wynne wrote to Sir W. Trumbull on 14 June, 1686: "As for C. D. [Lady Dorchester] I am unable to answer you. The party vanished hence of a good while and we took it for granted would appear next in Ireland. But I am apt to think another course was steered, first Northward to see some relatives, then back hither or not far off" (Marquis of Downshire's MSS., Hist. MSS. Comm., 1924, p. 184).

³ D. N. B., s.a. Katherine Sedley, Countess of Dorchester.

⁴ "Works and Life of C. Montague, late Earl of Halifax," etc. London (Curll), 1715.

⁵ "Moestissimæ ac Lætissimæ Cantabrigiensis affectus Decedente Caroli II Succedente Jacobo II, etc., Cantabrigiæ," 1684/5, 4to (see General Bibliography under "Cambridge").

in the book are unquestionably the vigorous heroic couplets by Charles Montague, a young graduate and fellow of Trinity, containing, among the usual flattery, some really musical lines such as the following, which compare the dead King's career to a river:

"But oh! he ebbs; the smiling waves decay
(For ever, lovely stream, for ever, stay);
To the black Sea his silent course does bend,
Where the best streams, the longest rivers end."

Sedley and Dorset were so impressed with this young poet's performance that they invited him and his friend, George Stepney (also of Trinity), to come to London, and enter the literary society of the capital under their patronage. Stepney refused the offer "out of his love for a retir'd life," but Montague accepted and thus laid the foundations of his brilliant public career. It is pleasant to imagine that Sedley visited his talented young friends at Cambridge, and renewed in their company the memories of his own undergraduate days in "another place."

On 25 March, 1686, Sir Charles was again seriously ill.¹ His condition was so serious that he was actually reported to have died on 13 April in a contemporary news-letter.² Apparently this illness completed the "conversion," the first signs of which had begun to appear about seven years before. Sir Charles seems to have gone so far as to have written an effusion in defence of the doctrines of the Church, which, unfortunately, has not been preserved. The spectacle of the orator who had "abused the scriptures" on the balcony of the Cock Tavern coming forward as a defender of Christianity was certainly tempting for a satirical wit. Young Charles Montague nearly yielded to the temptation of holding his patron up to public ridicule by means of a

¹ Add. MS. 2869. "25 March, 1686: Sir Charles Sedley is very ill and some think he will scarcely wether his disease." This note on a small scrap of paper is in an unknown hand.

² Marquis of Downshire's MSS., Hist. MSS. Comm., 1924, p. 150.

1686 satire in verse on his "conversion." Perhaps his conscience prevented him from finishing and publishing it. The draft remains in his handwriting in a small manuscript book in the British Museum, and has never hitherto been printed.¹ It provides some interesting information concerning Sedley's conversion. The following lines leave no room for doubt that the convert had written some kind of a defence of Trinitarian theology.

| | | |
|--|---|----|
| | Knight | |
| "Prodigious | Man that among Husks and swine | 10 |
| | Couldst learn the Mysterys of y^e sacred Trine | |
| | Could fathom mysterys and turn Divine | |
| [And in the sacred Trinitys Defence] ² | | |
| [Defys at Arms Reason and Coṃon sense] | | |
| Has drawn his Pen and thrown his Gantlet down | | 15 |
| To his forsaken Bretheren of the Town | | |
| To all that dare the Trinity disown | | |
| | | |
| Commence a Doctor reeking from ye stews | | 20 |
| The Apostolick Bard of Mother Hewes | | |
| | | |
| | valiant | |
| So our Great Sidley who has triumphed long | | 25 |
| us | our | |
| Kil'd [men] w th Satyr and [their] wives w th Song | | |
| Hew'd down the Monstrous Fopperys of men | | |
| On the High Altar Dedicates his Pen | | |
| Dos Club his Talent to the Churches stock | | 30 |
| And in the Quire displays the Comick sock." | | |

Line 21 gives the impression that the Baronet's Apologia was in verse, which is strengthened³ by the following lines that tell how, when Sedley takes to hymn-writing, "pretty Similes sprinkled here and there" will "Quicknen our flagging zeal like Botled

¹ Brit. Mus., Add. MSS. 28, 644, p. 57*b*. The whole draft is printed in Appendix I, p. 311.

² Lines and words enclosed in square brackets are crossed out in the original.

³ It is further strengthened by some verses in "Poems on Several Occasions" written by Philomela (i.e. Mrs. Rowe), 8vo, 1696.

"To Sir Charles Sedley.

*But stay, 'tis Sedley—and it were a crime
For me to grasp a subject so sublime:*

Beer." In an apostrophe to the Dog and Partridge, a 1686 favourite tavern of the Wits,¹ Montague makes an interesting reference to the death of Rochester under his usual pastoral pseudonym of Strephon.²

[“Lesse were thy joys and expectations crost
In Strephon’s Death, then now when Sidley’s lost.”]

The subsequent lines give a short history of Sedley’s return to a state of grace. The first symptoms seem to have appeared at the time of the tennis-court accident; a relapse to “prophanesse” followed, and the final conversion was sealed by a written testimony:

again
“Sidley He started once but did return [to you] 60 with his own pen
But now his ears are bored [He must be true]
When the Old Tennis Court fell on his back
Tho his soul flutter’d and the Goose cryed Quak
Devotion by Compulsion is but short
But this Relapse is of another sort.”

The profane conclusion drawn by the satirist is that Sedley learned to believe in the mystery of the Trinity from “the thieving Town” of “Rumey” or New Romney which he represented in Parliament. Romney

Since nothing but his own Cœlestial lays
Are fit the Authour of such flights to praise,
Nor dare my thoughts make the unequal choice,
My Infant muse has yet but try’d her tender voice.”

Now none of Sedley’s known poems could have been called “Cœlestial” even by the most brazen flatterer. I think it is highly probable that Mrs. Rowe is referring to the religious effusion which Montague ridiculed.

¹ “I expect to see my Lord Carlingford in his way to Vienna, then you may be sure that all the remains of the Dog, & Partridge will be remembred.” Etherege to Mr. Jepson, Ratisbon Letter Book, 27 February 8 March, 1687/8, f. 170. It is one of the taverns frequented by Sparkish, the fop, in Wycherley’s “The Country Wife,” and Lady Vaine is invited there by Master Whiskin in Shadwell’s “The Sullen Lovers.” According to Mr. Montague Summers, its real name was the Setting Dog and Partridge and it was situated in Fleet Street (see notes to “The Country Wife” in the Works of Wycherley, ed. Montague Summers, 1923).

² See Flatman’s “Pastorall” on Rochester’s death, Aubrey’s “Short Lives,” ed. Clark, II. 305.

1686 had a great wool market, and was also notorious for smugglers. Montague suggests that Sedley came to believe in the possibility of a triune deity from watching the Romney smugglers "squeeze three fleeces into one," in order to cheat the Customs. In a squib like this something must, of course, be allowed for the exaggerations of a satirist. Sedley's conversion could hardly have been such a complete volte-face as Montague suggests. At any rate, it did not prevent him from writing and publishing an excellent (but by no means edifying) comedy in 1687.

"Bellamira, or the Mistress," was staged at the King's house in May 1687. It is interesting to find that 1687 King James II went to see it.¹ He was apparently unaccompanied by his Queen, who was hardly likely to attend a play written by the father of her hated rival.

The fact that this play is an adaptation (and a very clever one) of "The Eunuch" of Terence suggests that Sedley had amused himself during his convalescence by renewing his acquaintance with the classics, and especially the author whom he had cited in his conversation with Dryden in 1664.² The quarto edition (licensed 24 May, 1687) contains an interesting "Preface to the Reader," where the dramatist gives a short account of the genesis of the play. As he was at work upon the first act, a friend came into his chamber and "seemed to approve the design." Sedley tells us that he offered his friend to finish the play and give it to him if "he could get it Acted under his own or another's name." The "friend" was probably Thomas Shadwell, who, as Oldys tells us,³ owed "whole scenes" to Sedley and Dorset. Shadwell did not accept the offer, probably because he was unable to produce anything under his own name because of Dryden's interference; Sedley therefore produced the piece under his own name, "or my friend would have lost his third night." The last remark is an allusion to 1687 the custom of giving the proceeds of the third night's performance as a benefit to the author. Had Sedley decided not to have the play staged, or to give it to another dramatist, he would have lost "the third night." He seems to imply that he produced it mainly in order to obtain the benefit and hand it over to Shadwell, whose finances were at a pretty low ebb at this time.¹ It is conceivable that the character of Merryman, the fat good-natured toper, was suggested by that of Shadwell, and it is interesting to compare the description of Merryman as having "drunk his Gallon every day these seven years," and as being "as true a shap'd Drunkard as heart can wish, Great Belly, double chin, thick legs," with Dryden's

¹ Warrant cited in Allardyce Nicoll's "Restoration Drama," p. 313.

² See p. 92.

³ Oldys's Notes to Langbaine, Note (9); see Appendix I, p. 320.

"Og from a treason-tavern rolling home,
Round as a globe and liquor'd ev'ry chink,
Goodly and great he sails behind his link."²

"Bellamira" was a great success on the stage, though it seems to have shocked certain ladies. Sedley twits these fastidious "nymphs" with some justice in his Preface with having crowded to plays of a far more outspoken character, and regrets that "the ice which has born so many Coaches and Carts should break with my wheel-barrow." The protest is, nevertheless, of some interest as one of the earliest expressions of disapproval of a comedy on moral grounds, and as showing that Jeremy Collier's famous indictment of Restoration drama gave voice to an opinion which had been gathering strength for some time.

From "Bellamira" we find that the haunts of the fashionable world had shifted further West since the date of the Mulberry Garden. In that play Coleby's Tavern and Hyde Park were the most westerly points to which the sparks and their "nymphs" penetrated.

¹ From letters in the Sackville collection it appears that Shadwell was living chiefly on Dorset's bounty in the reign of James II.

² "Absalom and Achitophel," Part II. ll. 459-61.

1687 In "Bellamira" there is an assignation at a "Walk in Kensington" and a scene is laid at Knightsbridge.

Shadwell repaid Sedley for the "benefit" of "Bellamira" by dedicating to him "The Tenth Satyr of Juvenal, English and Latin" (published in May 1687). Although written in Shadwell's usual clumsy style, this dedication is an exceedingly interesting document, and throws important light on the careers of both authors, as well as forming a valuable commentary on Dryden's "MacFlecknoe." It testifies to the frankness of Sedley's character in words which certainly have the ring of truth.

" . . . some [enemies] you have, though I cannot but wonder why you should have any, who are so careful in your Actions that you never injure any Gentleman, and so void of scurrilitie in your conversation, that I never heard you speak ill of anyone behind his back: a vice too often practis'd by our English Gentry."

To the charge of "obscenity" brought by "some Ladies" against "Bellamira," Shadwell retorts with that real and almost pathetic lack of decorum which was one of his chief characteristics, "that did not their thoughts lye very much that way, they could find no more obscenity in it than in any other Comedy." As though a certain amount of obscenity was essential to a comedy! There follows a tribute to Sedley's delicacy in performing the functions of a patron which is of very great value in an age when "gentlemen" often treated their literary dependents little better than their lackeys:—"The great favour you did me in giving me this play (Bellamira) I shall never forget, as I shall always be proud of an occasion to boast of so good a Patron who uses me not as some Supercilious Men would (who do good meerly out of vanity), as a troublesome hanger-on: but treats me with the civility and kindness of a Friend. And I have had the honour to have alwaies found as much of both from him, as if I had obliged him in receiving as much as he did in conferring his benefits." This passage, in spite of its clumsy grammar, does honour both to Shadwell and Sedley, and deserves to be quoted by every author who mentions the escapades of Sir Charles's youth. The rest of the Dedication is chiefly occupied by Shadwell's well-known answer to "MacFlecknoe." Incidentally, he mentions Sedley's opinion on that "Libel" (as he calls the Laureate's satire): "I have heard you observe the foundation of that libel is false and unnatural, for tho' some have mistaken dulness for Wit, and commended it as such, yet no man ever commended Dulness as dulness." If this was really Sedley's opinion, it is valuable rather as an expression of loyalty to his friend than as an example of his criticism, for the "foundation" of "MacFlecknoe" is the delightful assumption that a kingdom of dulness exists whose standards are the reverse of those of the rest of the world. Shadwell's parting shot at the Laureate is the grave accusation that his plays were "taken from a novel or stolen from a romance." Dryden might have replied that he sinned in company with Shakespeare, Fletcher and Corneille, and that, anyhow, such a reproach came with a singularly bad grace from one who had almost certainly received "whole scenes" from Sedley, a fact which Dryden knew and mentioned in "MacFlecknoe,"¹ and which Shadwell does not deny.

On 23 May "Gentle George," now his Britannic Majesty's Envoy at Ratisbon, expressed his pleasure at the success of "Bellamira."²

"... I have heard of the Success of y^e Eunuch [Bellamira]—and am very glad the Town has so good a tast to give the same just applause to Sir Charles

¹ "MacFlecknoe" ll. 162-3:

"But let no alien S-dl-y interpose,
To lard with wit thy hungry Epsom prose."

² Apparently Etherege was originally under the impression that Sedley had merely adapted an older play called "The Eunuch": "I saw a play about ten years ago call'd the Eunuch, so heavy a Lump, the Players durst not charge themselves with the dead weight. but it seems that Sir Ch. Sidley has animated the mighty mass and now it treads the Stage lightly he had always more wit than was enough for one man and therefore dos well to continue his Charity to one who wants it." Etherege to Lord Middleton: Ratisbon Letter Book, f. 105, 23 June/3 July, 1687.

Sidley's writing, w^{ch} his friends have always done to his conversation—few of our plays can boast of more wit than I have heard him speak at a Supper. Some baren sparks have found fault with what he has formerly done on this occasion, onely because the fatness of the Soile has produc'd too big a Crop—I dayly drink his health, my Lord Dorsets, Mr. Jepsons, Charles Godfrys, your own & all our friends.”¹

On 19 December he mentions Sedley in language that shows that the news of the conversion of the “Apostolick Bard of Mother Hewes” had reached Ratisbon: “Sir C. S. setts up for good houres, and sobriety,” while 1688/89 on 16 January, 1688/9, in a letter to Lord Middleton, Sir George expresses the fear that his lordship has become “as temperate as Sir Ch: Sydlie.”²

Before Etherege's last letter was written, events had happened in England that put an end to the diplomatic career of that brilliant butterfly. Katherine Sedley's shrewd prophecy that the King's Catholic advisers would lose him his crown had been fulfilled. Sedley's friend Dorset, who had been dismissed by James from his lord lieutenancy, was in the inner counsels of the Whig party, and, though he did not sign the famous written invitation to William of Orange, almost certainly knew and approved of the projected revolution. Sedley, as his intimate friend, must have been one of the many gentlemen who kept the secret of the great conspiracy. What part he actually played in the Revolution has not been recorded, but there is every reason to accept the tradition³ that he was an active supporter of the Prince of Orange. As an intimate friend of Dorset, it is highly probable that he was one of the band of noblemen and gentlemen who formed

¹ Ratisbon Letter Book, f. 94 (to Mr. Will Richards, 23 May/2 June, 1687).

² Sir Etherege's Ratisbon Letter Book, ff. 153, 160.

³ “At the Revolution he appeared warm on the side of King William.” Defoe, (?) “Some Account,” etc. prefixed to the edition of 1722.

a bodyguard for the Princess Anne in her flight from Whitehall to Nottingham. Perhaps Sedley helped his friend in the actual escape when Dorset carried off the Princess in a hackney coach on the night of 20 November, 1688.¹

After the flight of King James, the Prince of Orange ¹⁶⁸⁸ summoned "all such persons as served as knights, citizens or burgesses in any of King Charles's Parliaments to meet him at St. James's." Sir Charles, who had served in all the Parliaments of Charles II, and who was close at hand in Bloomsbury Square, must have been one of those who obeyed this summons. The body which thus assembled to meet the Prince must not be confused with the Convention which was elected later. Besides the ex-members of Parliament, it included the Lord Mayor and the Aldermen of London, and met at the Commons House, where it formed itself into a house, and elected Henry Powle Chairman. In the old St. Stephens' Chapel, looking out on the river and the green fields of Lambeth, where his mother had once petitioned the grim Puritans of the Long Parliament, and where he himself had sat in his youth among the gay sparks of the Cavalier Parliament in the 'sixties, Sir Charles Sedley probably voted with the rest for the momentous resolution, thanking the Prince of Orange for "rescuing of us all from the miseries of Popery and slavery," and calling upon him "to take over the administration of the country till the Convention could be elected."²

Sir Charles Sedley was not elected to the Convention, but he is said to have been present on horseback at the proclamation of King William and Queen Mary on 13 February, 1688/9. It was on this occasion that he ¹ Macaulay's "History of England," ed. Firth, p. 1162. When Anne was Queen, she created Sedley's illegitimate grandson a baronet (see p. 203). Perhaps this was intended to be a recompense for the assistance that Sedley may have given her in 1688.

² Cobbett's "Parliamentary History," V. 23, 24.

1688 made his most famous epigram. Someone had found it strange that the old courtier of Charles II should be among the most enthusiastic supporters of the Revolution. Sedley answered, "Well, I am even in point of civility with King James. For as he made my daughter a Countess, so I have helped to make his daughter a Queen."¹ According to a contemporary lampoon, Mrs. Katherine Sedley also expressed her sympathy with the Revolution in public :—

"But Sidley has some colour for his Treason,
A daughter Ravished without any Reason;
Good natur'd man, He is most strangely blest,
His Daughter's Honour is his Worship's Jest.
And she to keep her Father's honour up,
Drinks to the Dutch with Orange in her Cup."²

The fourth line places the authenticity of Sir Charles's famous jest beyond all doubt.

¹ "Some Account of the Life of Sir Charles Sedley" in the 1722 edition of the Works, I. 11. The author of the "Account" says that the jest was made "after Sir Charles had stickled hard for voting the throne vacant, as also for filling it up," and states that Sir Charles uttered it "when coming out of the Commons house." As Sedley did not sit in the Convention he could not have taken part in the debates on the Succession. The paper entitled "Reflections on our Late and Present Proceedings in England" ascribed to him by the editor of the 1722 edition (see p. 303), if it be indeed by him, shows that he was in favour of declaring the throne vacant only if the Prince of Wales was proved to be supposititious, and even then the author urges that the Princess of Orange only should succeed. As in the case of the tennis-court story, Defoe seems to have obtained an accurate account of Sedley's words but to have placed them in the wrong setting. While giving the wording of the "Account," I have followed the author of the "Life and Works of Charles Montague, Earl of Halifax" in laying the scene at the proclamation of William and Mary, at which Sedley would naturally be present. Montague's biographer absurdly ascribes the witticism not to Sedley but to Montague himself.

² "A Letter to my Lady Osborne" (1688, on f. 124 of a folio MS. book bound in original calf and bearing the bookplate of "the Right Honble William, Lord Craven, Baron Craven of Hampstead Marshall"). The lines quoted above were copied by Mr. G. Thorn Drury, who kindly communicated them to me.

CHAPTER VIII

SIR CHARLES SEDLEY IN PARLIAMENT, 1668-1701

"Truly, Sir, for my part, I renounce those partial measures, and if I cannot be chosen upon the account of General Service to the Nation, I will never creep into the Favour of any sort of Men and Vote against my Judgment."—Sir Charles Sedley in the House of Commons, 9 February, 1692/3.

SIR CHARLES SEDLEY'S parliamentary career is an extraordinary proof of the versatility of his character. A Wit of the Restoration usually passed his latter years idling about town and living on his reputation among the young men who gathered at Will's Coffee-house—or, if he was a Jacobite, in drinking confusion to the usurpers in Paris taverns and dancing attendance on the mock Court of St. Germain's. Unlike Wycherley and Etherege, however, Sedley, having inherited a fund of solid good sense, was capable of realising that a new England was born at the Revolution and of adapting himself to the changed conditions. He saw that the right place for a brilliant talker after 1688 was no longer the Court but the House of Commons, and, henceforward, employed the wit which had delighted Charles II and Buckingham to point a series of manly and sensible political speeches. Sedley and Rochester were, perhaps, the only two members of the fraternity of Wits who had a sense of the grim realities that formed the background of the riotous carnival of the Restoration. The Rochester who wrote that terrible (and altogether just) satire beginning "Chaste, prudent, pious Charles the Second" could see through the glittering tinsel of Whitehall as clearly as Andrew Marvell, and, if he had lived, might, under the guidance of Burnet, have become a great statesman. Sedley, with less genius than his friend, was incapable of leading a party, but he had the very qualities which are necessary for a brilliant parliamentary free-lance. The wit, good sense, and non-party spirit of his extant pieces call to mind the pamphlets of his great relative, George Savile, Marquis of Halifax. In those Parliaments of William III, when Sacheverell, Montague, Harley, and St. John were inaugurating the traditions of the two great political parties, it surely deserves no small praise to have helped to found that body of independent and critical opinion which has always existed since then between Whigs and Tories, and whose existence is as necessary as theirs for the well-being of the commonwealth.

When Sir Charles Sedley entered the House of Commons, it is very improbable that he had the slightest intention of playing a serious part in its debates. He was first elected as "a recruiter" (or as we say now at a by-election) for the constituency of New Romney, one of the Cinque Ports, close to the original seat of his family. The House of Commons to which he was returned was the famous Long Cavalier Parliament, which was elected in a frenzy of loyalty in 1662 1662, and which sat till 1679. The two members for New Romney (or "Barons" as the members for the Cinque Ports were called) at the General Election of 1662 were Norton Knatchbull and Charles Berkely. Berkely was created Lord Fitzharding (an Irish title) in 1663, and Earl of Falmouth in 1665. He was succeeded as member for New Romney by Henry Brouncker, who was expelled from the House on 1668 21 April, 1668, for having ordered the Fleet to slacken sail while pursuing the Dutch after the battle of Southwold Bay on 3 June, 1665, and also on the more general charge of being a person of infamous character.¹

¹ Pepys's Diary, ed. Wheatley, VII. 406 n., where it is incorrectly stated that Brouncker was succeeded as member for New Romney by Sir Charles Berkely, jun.

Sir Charles Sedley was elected to fill the vacancy thus 1668 caused in May.¹ A month later he was enjoying himself with Buckhurst and Nelly at Epsom, so it is hardly probable that his parliamentary duties weighed very heavily on him at this time. Probably he entered the House at the request of the King in order to swell the ranks of the Court party. He was certainly one of the numerous members of this "pensioners" Parliament who received the royal bounty in exchange for supporting the King's policy in the House. This is proved by an entry in a list of "ye Parliament Pensioners in ye session of Parliament 1670" made by Sir W. Haward, where it is stated that "Sir Charles Sedley promised y^e king to be absent."²

It is impossible to say how long Sedley remained a 1677-78 member of the Court party. By 1677 he seems to have ceased to be a "pensioner." In a list of the members who received bribes from the Court, published in that year, and probably compiled by Andrew Marvell,³ his name does not occur, although several of the other "Barons of the Cinque Ports" are mentioned among the "Principal Labourers in the Great Design of Popery and Arbitrary Power." When the papers of the Romaniſt conspirator, Coleman, were seized after he had been accused by Titus Oates, Sedley was one of the gentlemen employed to translate the French documents among them. On 25 October, a letter from Coleman to the Internuncio at Brussels was read to the House of Lords in a translation by Sedley.⁴ This

¹ "Alumni Oxonienses," IV. 1332 (Early Series).

² Sir William Haward's MSS. (in the possession of G. Thorn Drury, Esq., K.C.), p. 258.

³ "A Seasonable Argument to Persuade all the Grand Juries of England to Petition for a New Parliament or a List of the Principal Labourers in the Great Design of Popery or Arbitrary Power," etc. Amsterdam, 1677, 4to (ascribed to Marvell in the British Museum Catalogue).

⁴ Hist. MSS. Comm., 11th Report, Appendix, Pt. II. (MSS. of the House of Lords), p. 5. The letter was printed by Sir George Treby in 1677-78 letter, written by an agent of the Duke of York, recommends his supporters "to Distract the Parliament to that degree that they shall never agree among themselves; so that they shall be altogether useless to the King; and by that means he will be forc'd to lay them aside." Such a letter may well have convinced Sir Charles of the sinister designs of the Duke and his friends, and it is probable that he went over to the Opposition about this time. In December 1678, Bedloe, one of Oates's chief accomplices in the anti-Catholic agitation, boasted of his intimacy with "Middlesex (i.e. Buckhurst), Rochester and Sedley."¹ Sir Charles was also, it must be remembered, an intimate friend of Shadwell, the Whig dramatist, who was a member of the Green Ribbon Club at the King's Head Tavern in Fleet Street, the headquarters of the newly organised Whig party.² No complete list of the members of that society exists, and though Sedley's name occurs in none of the extant lists, it is quite possible that he may have been a member. At any rate, as Shadwell's friend, he must often have sat pipe in hand in those reeking tavern-rooms where the dangers of arbitrary power and the sinister designs of the "Papiſts" were discussed, and the new and heady theories of religious and civil liberty expounded. Whatever his views may have been, however, there is no record that he ever spoke in the Long Cavalier Parliament except on 8 February, 1672, when he protested against Constable Axton's invasion of his privilege.³

1678/79 At the General Election of March, 1678/9, Sir Charles Sedley and Paul Barret, Esq., were elected

his "Second Part of the Collection of Letters and Writings relating to the Horrid Popish Plot," London, 1681. The full text is given in Appendix I, pp. 310-11.

¹ Memorandum concerning Bedloe, endorsed by Ormonde, Calendar of the MSS. of the Marquis of Ormonde (Hist. MSS. Comm.), New Series, III. 273.

² See Sir George Sitwell's "The First Whig," pp. 197-203.

³ See p. 131.

"Barons" for New Romney.¹ It was in this very month that the birth of Katherine Sedley's first child by the Duke of York became publicly known. Sir Charles, doubtless, availed himself of an excellent opportunity for avenging his daughter's seduction by voting for the 1679 First Exclusion Bill, introduced in May 1679. This probability is strengthened by the fact that he was re-elected both at the General Election of October 1679, when the Whigs triumphed all over the country, and again to the turbulent Parliament that met at Oxford in March 1680/81, which contained a smaller 1680-81 but still a distinct majority of Whigs.² The serious illness which followed the tennis-court accident in January 1679/80 must have prevented him from taking part in the debates of these Parliaments. The Oxford Parliament departed from the usual custom of those days by printing and publishing its debates. The presence of a copy of the "Debates of 1680/81" among Sir Charles's books³ shows that, whether present or not, he followed the proceedings of the House with interest.

Sedley was not elected to King James's first and only Parliament, which met on 19 May, 1685, and this suggests that he was by now definitely regarded by the Court as an opponent. The constituent bodies had been 1685 carefully remodelled and manipulated by the agents of the Crown in order that none but Tories of the deepest dye should obtain seats, and it may be supposed that the borough of New Romney did not escape the attentions of the authorities. The two "Barons" chosen to represent this ancient constituency in 1685 were Sir Benjamin Bathurst and Sir William Goulston.⁴ As Sedley was not elected for any other constituency, this

¹ Hasted's "Kent," III. 425.

² The dedication of Crowne's "Henry VI" definitely proves that he had joined the Whigs by the Autumn of 1681. See p. 148.

³ See Appendix II, p. 331.

⁴ "A True and Compleat List of the Lords, etc. . . . of the Present Parliament summoned to meet the nineteenth of this inst. May, 1685" (Bodleian, Wood, 276, p. xciii a).

1685 evidence is sufficient to confute the often-repeated statement that he distinguished himself in this Parliament by opposing the Court on the burning question of the standing army after Sedgemoor.¹ There may, however, be a little fire behind the smoke of this story. We learn from a letter of the French Ambassador, Barillon, dated 26 November, 1685 (N.S.), that the debate of the Commons on the 12th November (O.S.) was "full of heat and disputes." The debate in question was on the Speech from the Throne, the consideration of which had been postponed for three days on the 9th November. This Speech, which demanded additions to the standing army and the retention of "Papist" officers, had, by its offensive matter and tactless wording, succeeded in creating a breach in the overwhelming Tory majority. An opposition to the Court was formed from a coalition of the few Whigs who had seats with a large body of members who, though Tories, regarded the King's arbitrary policy with just apprehensions. The difficulties of organising a solid "country party" out of such material in three days were very great, for nearly all the members of the 1685 Parliament were new-comers to the House, and utterly ignorant of Parliamentary ways. Barillon says significantly, "there was much intriguing on the eve (of the debate). Old Parliamentarians who are not in the present Parliament had coached (avoient instruit) the new deputies."² What this means is quite clear. The organisers of the new Opposition took advantage of the three days' grace to take counsel with old Whig members of the Parlia- 1685 ments of Charles II, who had been unseated at the last election, and who happened to be in town. Sir Charles Sedley may well have been one of the counsellors who breathed a spirit of revolt into the wavering Tories. If this conjecture is well founded, there may be some truth, after all, in the statement of the writer¹ who tells us that Sir Charles "had a great sway" in James II's House of Commons, and that he "violently 1688-90 oppos'd the policy of the Court in that House."

¹ The author of "The Life of C. Montagu, Earl of Halifax" (in "The Works and Life of the Rt. Hon. Charles, late Earl of Halifax") writes, in atrocious English, that "the Two friends (Dorset and Sedley) violently oppos'd the Court's project of a Standing Army, one of which (Dorset) bore a great sway in the House of Peers, the other in the House of Commons, whose interest was so great in both, especially Sir Charles Sedley's," etc. The tale is repeated in the article on Sedley in "Biographia Britannica" and elsewhere.

² Barillon, 26 November, 1685 ("Lettres, etc., d'Angleterre," Vol. 156, f. 224).

It is probable, as we have noticed above, that Sedley was a member of the body which assembled to meet William of Orange on 23 December, 1688, and invited him to take over the administration till the Convention was elected. However, in the General Election which returned the Convention itself, he either did not stand or was unsuccessful, for the two members for New Romney were John Brewer and John Chadwick, and no other constituency elected Sir Charles Sedley. In the second Parliament of King William, elected in March 1690, Sir Charles Sedley and John Brewer were elected at New Romney, and it is in this Parliament that Sir Charles Sedley's political career really begins. Hitherto he had probably never spoken on public business, and, like the majority of members, had 1690 confined his parliamentary activities to voting. He now became an important and influential speaker.

The General Election of 1690 was, perhaps, the first fought on something like modern party lines, and the utmost acrimony was displayed by both sides. The Whigs published lists of members of the Convention who had voted against declaring the throne vacant, and stigmatised them as Jacobites, while the Tories set forth the names of the supporters of the Corporation
Bill,² and warned the electors that they were Repub-

¹ The author of "The Life of Charles Montagu, Earl of Halifax."

² A measure designed to restore the rights of Corporations, which had been forfeited by James II, to which Sacheverell, the Whig leader, 1690 licans, Fanatics, and Latitudinarians. Many seats were lost and gained by both sides, and when the Houses met, the Tories, together with a considerable body of Whigs, who were discontented with the policy of the Government, had a small but decisive majority.¹ Sedley's political position seems to have been close to that of the discontented Whigs, though he was, apparently, prepared to support the Ministry on certain occasions.

On 31 March,² eleven days after the meeting of Parliament, the Commons went into Committee on the question of Supply. They had already voted the revenue of the King and Queen, and were asked by the Government for large sums for the Army, Navy, and Civil List. The last item, a disgracefully long list of pensions for placemen and courtiers, was attacked by Sedley in a witty and manly speech; which made his reputation as a parliamentary orator. Contrasting the ease with which "the Courtiers and Great Officers," helped by their salaries, paid the heavy taxes, with the difficulties of the country gentlemen, he used a vivid image, representing the former as "charging in armour" so that "they do not feel the taxes," while the country gentleman, unaided by a salary from the State, was "shot through and through." He made the very rational suggestion that "we (the Commons) should tell him (the King) what pensions are too great, what places are to be extinguished during the time of War and Public Calamity." In language that recalls a letter which he wrote some years later to Sir Richard Newdigate, he complained that the King "sees nothing but coaches and six and great tables," and "cannot imagine the want had added a clause to prevent any person who had been concerned in the surrendering of the Corporation privileges to James in any way from holding any municipal office for seven years. This clause would have kept nearly all the Tory party out of municipal offices for seven years.

¹ Macaulay, "History of England," ed. Firth, p. 1794. Trevelyan, "England under the Stuarts," p. 452.

² Cobbett's "Parliamentary History," V. 562; Sedley's "Miscellaneous Works," 1702 (Speeches, etc.), p. 1. Many MS. copies of this speech exist, and also a printed broadside.

and misery of the rest of his subjects." He concluded in 1690 a sensible and manly strain: "We must save the King money wherever we can, for I am afraid the War is too great for our purses, if things are not managed with all imaginable thrift. When the people of England see all things saved that can be saved, that there are no exorbitant pensions or unnecessary salaries, we shall give and they shall pay whatever his Majesty shall want, to secure the Protestant religion and keep out the King of France, and King James too, whom"—the speaker added, and we can imagine the roar of laughter which greeted this hit at the numerous Jacobites on the Tory benches—"whom, by the way, I have not heard mentioned this Session, but whether out of Fear, Discretion, or Respect I cannot tell."

Although this speech, unfortunately, had no immediate effect on the Government's policy, it had an immense success not only in the House of Commons but all over the country. Indeed, it must have been one of the earliest parliamentary speeches to exercise a considerable influence outside the capital. It was printed and probably hawked as a broadside, and many MS. copies were also circulated. Anthony à Wood, Sedley's old friend at Oxford, received a copy,¹ and, according to a letter dated 5 April, 1690, it caused quite a stir at Worcester, where the local gentry crowded to the coffee-house to read it.² It was answered by an anonymous defender of the Government in a broadside entitled "Remarques upon a Late Printed Speech under the Name of Sir Charles Sidley."³ It may be supposed

¹ "The Life and Times of Anthony à Wood," III. 348. Wood states that "it (the speech) was spoken at the beginning of December." He must have blundered, for Cobbett's statement that it was spoken in the debate of 31 March is confirmed by the letter from Worcester quoted below, which is dated 5 April.

² Bodleian, Ballard MS., Vol. 35, fol. 59, Letter 34.

³ "Remarques upon a Late Printed Speech under the Name of Sir Charles Sidley. . . . London. Printed by W. Bonny, 1691." See Bibliography.

1690 that the author of this production was paid by the Ministry to put up some kind of a defence against Sedley's widely-read attack. After sneering at Sir Charles's speech as something on which "it would be very silly to throw away ink and paper . . . were it not that there is nothing so absurd, but there are a great many who will readily swallow it," he proceeds to pay it the compliment of answering it in detail. His replies to Sedley's attacks, however, amount to little more than an expression of blind trust in the King and his ministers. The high salaries of the courtiers are defended on the ground that, if the King "means his affairs to prosper, he must provide Encouragement Suitable to the Places he prefers any to." The writer does not, however, attempt to answer Sedley's complaint concerning the difficulty of the country gentlemen in paying the heavy taxes, and he concludes with a curious innuendo to the effect that the real object of the member for New Romney was to promote a republican movement. On Sedley's jest that he had not heard King James mentioned during the Session, "whether out of Fear, Respect or Discretion," his adversary makes the totally unwarranted comment, "Would he have King James Voted in again, or made a Pretence to raise such a Confusion, as thereout may spring a Commonwealth?"

On 3 April the House was again in Committee of Supply, and Sir Charles Sedley called on the Government to adopt a firm policy towards the Irish Jacobites, and retaliate on the administration at Dublin for its confiscations by seizing the estates of its adherents in England in order to prevent their going to Ireland "to support the War."¹ On the 30th a Regency Bill² to provide for the administration during King William's absence in Ireland had been brought down from the 1690 Lords. This Bill made it lawful for Queen Mary to "administrate the government of the kingdom in his (William's) name and her own," but enacted that at the same time the King should retain all his authority.¹ Objection was at once raised on the ground that the Bill set up two separate powers in the State, and that a functionary might receive diametrically opposite orders from the King and Queen; it was also stated that the wording of the Bill would, if it passed into law, cause all commissions to determine. The debate was, therefore, postponed in order to give members time to hear legal advice. When it was brought up again on 5 May, Sedley remarked, sensibly enough, in reply to the quibbles of the Opposition, that "he could not see any hurt for so short a time by the authority of the King and the consent of Parliament."² When amendments were discussed on the next day, he went to the root of the question by observing that the King could not go to Ireland (where his presence was urgently needed) until the Bill was passed. "His foot is in the stirrup and you catch him upon the shoulder and say 'he shall not go.' Whether the King go or stay, leave it to his choice. If you do not pass the Bill it is impossible for him to go."³

¹ Debates of the House of Commons from . . . 1667 . . . to . . . 1694. Collected by the Hon. Anchtell Grey, 8vo, 1769, X. 40. Cobbett, V. 574.

² Cobbett, V. 611.

On 13 May, Sir Edward Seymour, the Tory leader, moved that the House should go into Committee "to consider how to preserve the Peace of the Nation in the King's absence." Sedley, who had supported the Government on the question of the Regency, now spoke in favour of Seymour's motion on the ground that Queen Mary, "though a wise woman," was yet a woman, and that she would be advised by "some of his own (William's) Council and some of King James's Council, a mixed Council." This reasoning with its sly allusion to Tory members of the Council as "King James's

¹ Macaulay's "History of England," ed. Firth, IV. 1830.

² Anchitell Grey, X. 114; Cobbett, V. 6.

³ Ibid., X. 131; Cobbett, V. 634.

1690 Council" could hardly have been welcome to Seymour.¹ On the 14th there was a debate on the motion that "the House should go into Committee to consider the Ways and Means to preserve the Peace and Safety of the Kingdom in the King's absence." The Opposition members raised objections to the powers given to the new inner Council² or "Cabinet" appointed by William to advise his Queen in his absence. These powers were stated to constitute a suspension of Habeas Corpus.³ Sedley insinuated, probably with some justice, that the members who were "out" of the Queen's Council were raising difficulties out of jealousy of those who were "in." "I have been cooking this dish many a time,"⁴ he said, implying that it was not the first time he had heard such interested complaints. Sir John Guise, one of the Opposition members who spoke later, twitted Sir Charles for his use of this homely metaphor as follows: "I do not doubt of Sedley's cooking and eating well." It may be imagined that Sir Charles joined heartily in the merriment provoked by this allusion to his well-known epicurean tastes. Some members tried to turn the debate into a discussion of the merits of the Marquis of Caermarthen, one of the members of the new Council, who had never been loved by the Commons, and who, under the style of the Earl of Danby, had been impeached by them in the reign of Charles II. Sedley pointed out the irrelevancy of the attacks on this nobleman, and, incidentally, stated that he "had received no disobligation nor any favour from him."⁵

The next Session opened on 22 October, after the King's return from his victorious campaign in Ireland. The Speech from the Throne emphasised the necessity (which was indeed pressing) for maintaining a strong

¹ Anchitell Grey, X. 138; Cobbett, V. 639.

² This Council consisted of Devonshire, Dorset, Monmouth and Edward Russell (Whigs); Caermarthen, Pembroke, Nottingham, Marlborough and Lowther (Tories).

³ Cobbett, V. 642.

⁴ Anchitell Grey, X. 142; Cobbett, V.

⁵ Ibid.

fleet and army. On 9 November the Estimates were discussed in a Committee of Supply. The Opposition raised cries of protest against what was then considered the enormous sum of four millions. All that survives of Sedley's remarks on this occasion is the following cryptic sentence: "If one member sits in the House in his buff coat, and another in his shirt, one will be sweltered while the other's teeth chatter in his head."¹ Without the context, which seems to be missing, it is difficult to divine the meaning of this fragment. Perhaps it is again a reference to the fact that the courtiers could bear the cost of the Estimates more easily than the country gentlemen.

On 18 November a Bill to amend the barbarous procedure for trials in cases of High Treason was read for the third time. It provided that henceforth persons accused of High Treason should have Counsel, should be allowed to summon witnesses for the defence, should be given a copy of the indictment, and that no overt act should be given in evidence excepting those which were contained in the indictment. Sedley spoke forcibly in favour of the Bill, which he defended with the pithy remark that "good kings, good lawyers and good judges are perishable commodities,"² the obvious inference being that, instead of trusting to heaven to send them, it was better to erect barriers against the encroachments of bad ones. He quoted effectively the judicial murder of Cornish, the London alderman who was convicted and hanged in the reign of James II on the evidence of one man with whom he had a private quarrel. Sedley may very likely have seen the mock trial of Cornish by the infamous Jeffreys, and his subsequent execution, and may have remembered the ghastly cruelty with which the Government of James II pursued their victim, even after his death, by impaling his head on the Guildhall. On 3 December there was a debate on the money demanded by the Government for

¹ Anchitell Grey, X. 142; Cobbett, V. 170.

² Ibid., 171.

1690 "secret service"—in those days mainly employed in bribery. Sedley made a speech of which probably only a fragment survives. The substance of it seems to have been an ironical defence of the prevailing system of organised parliamentary corruption. "We give great sums," he said, referring to the large supplies voted by the Commons, "but must not receive," and "for secret service no Parliament man ought to be ashamed." The remark that he was "an old Parliament man but a young speaker," confirms the supposition that he had rarely, if ever, spoken on public business before in any previous Parliament. He told the following anecdote to illustrate the principle on which members received bribes:—"One in my company when I was young would needs give the fiddlers two or three pieces though he loved music as little as I; but he went shares with the fiddlers." He concluded by appealing for an inquiry, on the ground that the suspicions cast on the Secret Service accounts were "a Reflection upon every member."¹

The Bill for regulating trials for High Treason² came back from the Lords with an important amendment. Peers indicted of High Treason were formerly tried by the whole House of Lords, if the trial took place while Parliament was sitting; but, if it took place during a recess, they were tried by twelve peers chosen at will by the Lord Steward and called Triers. The Lords pointed out that under this arrangement a Lord High Steward could pack his little court with personal enemies of the accused, if the latter was unfortunate enough to be tried during a recess. They desired that a peer accused of High Treason should always be tried by the whole peerage, whether the Parliament were sitting or not. The Whigs in the Commons, though they could not oppose the Bill itself without denying their fundamental principles, had not supported it with the ardour which they probably would have shown if it had been introduced in the reigns of Charles or ¹⁶⁹⁰ James. The present King was in a sense their leader and the champion of Protestantism and liberty. Acts of High Treason were likely to be committed, not by Roundheads or Republicans, but by High Churchmen and Jacobites. They were therefore glad enough of the occasion which the Lords' amendment offered to wreck the Bill. Through their brilliant spokesman, Charles Montague, they represented the Lords as anxious to extend their already great privileges. A trial by the whole peerage, they contended, meant a certain acquittal, as so many peers were related by blood to each other, and, as attendance was voluntary, the court would be filled with relatives of the accused. No argument was ever listened to so eagerly by seventeenth-century Houses of Commons as those which were directed against an extension of the privileges of the Lords. Sedley was one of the members who refused to listen to Montague's appeal to class sentiment. He urged the Commons to give the Lords "the little shed" which they demanded to protect their order, and hinted that, as "some strangers are now made lords,"¹ while other peers had pensions from the Government, a Lord Steward's court instituted on the old plan might be as unjust as those which had sat in former reigns. The reference to the "stranger" Lords glances, of course, at the Dutch favourites of the King, such as Bentinck, Zulestein and Keppel.

¹ Anchitell Grey, X. 198-9; Cobbett, V. 671.

² Macaulay, "History of England," ed. Firth, V. 2111-17.

The next occasion on which Sedley is recorded to have spoken was when William Fuller, the apostate Jacobite agent and imitator of Oates and Dangerfield, was brought at his own request to the Bar of the House on 9 December, ¹⁶⁹¹ 1691. He had formerly disclosed to the King some important letters with which he had been entrusted by Mary of Modena. After living extravagantly on the credit gained by this infamous deed, he had run through all his own money and much of his

¹ Anchitell Grey, X. 219.

1691 patron's, and had found himself in a debtors' prison. In order to regain his former position he concocted a Jacobite "plot" on the model of Oates's famous performance. He first tried to gain the confidence of Tillotson, Archbishop of Canterbury, and William Bentinck, Lord Portland, the King's favourite adviser. When rebuffed by these dignitaries, he asked permission to tell his tale to the Commons. The substance of it was that a huge Jacobite conspiracy existed in England. Many noblemen were named, and among them the great Marquis of Halifax, who was said to be the ringleader. In the debate that followed these "disclosures," Sedley shrewdly remarked that "this young man has accused so many that were he an angel from heaven, I should not believe him."¹ Later in the debate, however, his scepticism seems to have been shaken, and he pointed to the fact that the Queen had formerly trusted Fuller as evidence that his tale might be true. He suggested that the House should take him under their protection and address the King to reward him, provided that he produced "original papers with hands and seals"—which, of course, was beyond the power of the wretched Fuller. On 4 January Fuller attended the Bar again and told a long story about two persons (apparently in France) who were afraid to come over to England, but who could give important information to the Government. Sedley suggested that "the fellow" (Fuller) should be offered a yacht or messengers² "to bring over his informers." The upshot of the matter was that the House, after bearing with Fuller's evasions remarkably patiently, voted him "a Notorious Impostor, a Cheat and false Accuser," and addressed the King to direct the Attorney-General to prosecute him. He ended his career of plot-monger in the pillory.³

1691/92 On 11 January, 1691/2, various ways of raising money were discussed. Sir Robert Cotton proposed a subscription among the members. Sedley suggested ^{1691/92} that the amount should be £500, on the ground that those who had "good estates" could spare it "out of their pensions," while for those who had not it was enough. Sir Edward Seymour's far more acceptable project of a poll-tax was adopted.¹

¹ Cobbett, V. 672.

² Anchitell Grey, X. 225.

³ Macaulay, "History of England," ed. Firth, V. 2136.

The Fourth Session opened on 4 November, 1692. ¹⁶⁹² The Battle of La Hogue had been fought and won on 19 May, and all danger of a French invasion was for the time being removed. The Commons, after voting thanks to Admiral Russell, listened to his narrative of the victory. A debate followed on the conduct of the fleet, and the question whether the victory had been sufficiently followed up was discussed. Sir John Ashby, Admiral of the Blue, was accused of allowing twenty-six French ships to escape into St. Malo. The fire-eaters of the House of Commons were indignant, and Sir Robert Howard (Sedley's old friend of the days of the "Essay of Dramatic Poesy") was absurd enough to quote, as an example for contemporary admirals, the attack on St. Malo in Cromwell's time, when the Protector sent Blake to batter that town until a priest who had "abused an Englishman" was delivered up. The chief evidence against Ashby was the "R  lation" of the French admiral, Tourville, which had transpired. Sedley, acknowledging that Tourville's "R  lation" reflected on Ashley, made the sensible and eminently just proposal that the Admiral of the Blue should be allowed to come to the Bar of the House and speak in his own defence. The House assented to this suggestion and the Admiral appeared before them on the 19th and easily cleared himself.

On the 18th November a fresh Bill for Regulating Trials in cases of Treason was discussed, and Sir William Whitlock moved its commitment. Sedley supported the motion on the ground that he did not wish "to endanger the King's safety," and added—probably

¹ Anchitell Grey, X. 226; Cobbett, V. 692.

1692 in jest—as an additional reason, that, if the Bill were committed, “we who cannot make long speeches can speak to parts of it.”¹

The English hatred of the King’s Dutch friends, which so frequently manifested itself during the reign of William III, found a particularly ignoble expression on the 22nd of this month in the Commons. A motion to address the King to dismiss the foreign general officers in the English service had been proposed. Sedley raised a protest which does him credit:—“I think it is the highest ingratitude to turn out these Generals. These Gentlemen have been the King’s Companions of his Arms: ’twill be hard upon the King to turn them out.”²

Occasions for Sedley to speak on one of his favourite topics were produced by the famous Place Bills of 1692–4. These measures were directed against the hordes of “placemen,” or salaried Government officials, who lived on the public revenue. They were the result of that indignation against prodigal public expenditure which Sedley himself had helped to rouse by his celebrated speech in 1690. The object of the promoters of the “Bill for Free and Impartial Proceedings,” as the first “Place Bill” was called, was to exclude from the House of Commons all persons receiving salaries from the State. This measure was introduced into the House of Commons on 22 December, 1692. Had it become law, it would, as Macaulay points out,³ have had a very different effect from that which its promoters designed. For it would have excluded not only the numerous minor officials who were merely paid supporters of the Government, but also the great officers of State, whom we now call Cabinet Ministers, from the Lower House. The inevitable result would have been that ministers would have found seats in the Lords, and that the centre of gravity of the constitution would have been shifted to the Upper House. After passing the Commons the

¹ Anchitell Grey, X. 251.

² Ibid., p. 255.

³ Macaulay’s “History of England,” ed. Firth, V. 2292–4.

Bill was rejected by three votes in the Lords. The second ¹⁶⁹² Place Bill, substantially the same as the first, was introduced about a year later, in December 1692. In its original form it had provided that no member of the House of Commons elected after 1 January, 1694, should accept any place of profit under the Crown under pain of forfeiting his seat, and being declared incapable of sitting again in the same Parliament. Having passed the Commons, it went up to the Lords, who made an important amendment by adding to the clause cited above the following words: "unless he be afterwards again chosen to serve in the same Parliament." This amendment would have made the law substantially what it is at the present day. The King, however, took the view that the Bill was merely an attempt to encroach upon his prerogative, and refused the royal assent. On 20 February, 1694/5, a third Place Bill was introduced. It was rejected by the Commons by thirty-three votes on the third reading, and, as no copy has survived, it is impossible to say whether it differed from its two ill-starred predecessors.

Sir Charles Sedley made two speeches in connection with these Bills, but no record of the dates of ¹⁶⁹²⁻ ^{1694/95} their delivery has survived. Cobbett, in his "Parliamentary History," places them both in the debates on the first Place Bill, but there is no reason why they should not have been spoken on the occasion of the second or third. The earlier of the two seems to have been delivered before one of the measures was introduced, for its opening words contain a suggestion that such a Bill should be introduced forthwith: "We shall, I hope, Mr. Speaker, return to our Vote and make provision by Bill that no member may be concerned in the Revenue."¹ The second speech seems to have been delivered soon after, for it contains references to certain events mentioned in the first. In both Sir Charles

¹ "Miscellaneous Works," 1702 (Speeches, etc.), p. 13.

1692— alludes ironically to an offer (not elsewhere recorded)
1694/95 made by the placemen to abandon all their profits exceeding £800 a year—if they were allowed to retain their seats in the Commons. Sedley was not inclined to take this offer seriously. He compares it to a similar proposal made by Sir Harry Vane in Cromwell's time, and ironically describes "the raptures of kindness" into which he broke when he heard of the magnanimity of "these worthy gentlemen." The most forcible part of the first speech is a passage which drives home the sound axiom that the real interests of the King and the people under the English constitution alike favoured economy, while those of the placemen were opposed to any reduction in the expenditure. He cites, as a proof, the fact that Charles II, who had landed estates worth £360,000 a year at the Restoration, by yielding to the importunities of courtiers, alienated the whole of the property, and thus injured both himself and the people, who had to pay more taxes to make up the loss. Sedley's old master, "Rowley," would probably have taken a different view of the matter, and Sir Charles does not mention that a large part of the Crown lands was granted, not to courtiers, but to the King's mistresses and natural children.

The second speech suggests that, not only should the salaries of placemen be limited, but also their numbers. It contains a very shrewd criticism of the Cabinet system: "Members of Parliament, though well principled, have no privileges to be fit for anything without practice, study, or application."

1692/93 A Bill providing for Triennial Parliaments passed the Lords without a division in January 1692/3. When it came down to the Commons it was hotly opposed by the Tories and the Opposition Whigs. Sedley spoke against it several times. On 28 January he suggested that another Parliament might not be so "affectionate" as the present one "to oppose the French," and also that an act which dissolved Parliament automatically was a serious invasion of the King's prerogative.¹ A second and much longer speech, delivered apparently on the first reading,² made an appeal to the deep-rooted suspicion that the Commons entertained towards any measure coming from the Lords which was likely to curtail their privileges. The speaker also argued against the idea that such a Bill could provide a security against a bad king. Such a king, he pointed out, could use Triennial Parliaments, as well as those chosen in the old manner, to invade the liberties of the nation, if such were his will, and could exercise his prerogative of choosing "the Time and Place" of the Session in order to overawe or cajole the majority (as Charles II had done at Oxford in 1681). A third speech on the same subject, delivered on 9 February, makes an appeal to Cavalier prejudice by warning members that, if the present House passed an Act dissolving itself, it might be compared to the Long Parliament of Charles I. The argument that follows, however, could not have been appreciated much by the Tories, with whom on this occasion Sedley found himself in alliance. It is a plea that the present measure was unnecessary under so good a king, so staunch a Protestant and such an indomitable foe to France as William III, and is enforced by a comparison between that monarch and his predecessors, Charles II and James II, the latter a "papist" and the former "suspected for that religion." Later in this speech, Sedley seems to imply that, if the Bill had come from the Commons, he might have supported it, but was opposed to "a surprise upon us from the Lords." Finally, he warns the House that to vote for this Bill will have the appearance of truckling to the constituencies in order to obtain re-election. His last words have a fine manly ring and might be quoted by honest politicians in all ages.

"Truly, Sir, for my part I renounce these partial

¹ Anchitell Grey, X. 299.

² "Miscellaneous Works," 1702 (Speeches, etc.), pp. 5-9.

1692/93 measures, and if I cannot be chosen on account of general service to the Nation, I will never creep into favour of any sort of men and vote against my judgment.”¹

Sir Charles spoke once more against the Triennial Bill on the 10th. He warned the House that the Commitment of the Bill would be “the best news the Jacobites could possibly have,” for it was “putting to an ingenious death a Parliament which served the King and nation well.” He disavowed any personal apprehensions of a General Election, and, after recalling his thirty years’ service in Parliament, wittily quoted St. Paul’s “Cupio dissolvi.”²

1692/93– In spite of Sir Charles’s eloquence, the Bill was 1693 carried with a slight amendment lengthening the life of the actual Parliament. The upshot of the matter is curiously linked with literary history. William III, uncertain whether he should veto the Bill or not, sought the advice of the veteran statesman, Sir William Temple. The latter, too infirm to leave his retirement at Moor Park, sent young Jonathan Swift, his secretary, to Kensington with directions to use his talents to persuade the King to acquiesce in the decision of Parliament. Swift’s arguments, though doubtless expressed in admirable prose, were of no avail, and William, convinced that the Bill was merely an attempt to encroach on his prerogative, exercised his right of veto. On 5 1693 December, 1693, Sedley warned the House against yielding to the popular prejudice against standing armies. The army was now the nation’s defence against “France and Popery.” “If Holland is to be destroyed, it is our turn next. . . .” He told members that there was “a great and terrible sum to be raised,” and “We cannot be safe without an Army, neither safe at Home nor considerable abroad.”³ Nothing could have been truer or more seasonable than these arguments in the winter of 1693/94 1693/4, but it may be wondered whether the patriotism which seems to inspire them was not mingled with a desire to gain the favour of William III, whose heart ^{1693/94} was set on the maintenance of a strong English army.

¹ Cobbett, V. 764.

² Anchitell Grey, X. 304.

³ Ibid., 341.

In a Grand Committee held on 26 January to consider the King's rejection of the Bill for Triennial Parliaments, Sir Charles seems to have attempted to speak towards the end of the debate, but "was not heard."¹ On 1 February, in a debate on King William's answer to the Address in which the Commons protested against his rejection of the Bill for Triennial Parliaments, Sedley defended the King's attitude as follows:—"I know not how a crowned Head can descend to other Answer. But an offender at the Bar may be expected to say he will do so no more." He seems to have been interrupted by the Opposition, as the rest of his remarks were inaudible.²

At the General Election of November 1695, the ¹⁶⁹⁵ Whigs gained many seats. There was a sharp contest at New Romney. John Brewer retained his seat, but Sir Charles Sedley lost his by a single vote to Sir William Twisden, a Tory who had sat in James II's Parliament. This isolated Tory victory, in an election where the tide ran generally in favour of the Whigs, may be attributed to the Jacobite tendencies of the inhabitants of New Romney, whose prosperity depended very largely on the illicit trade which they carried on with France. Sedley, however, regained the seat, for Twisden was also elected for Appleby, and so vacated the Kentish constituency in favour of his adversary.³

The only recorded speech delivered by Sedley in the new Parliament is one which does him great honour. It is an eloquent and witty plea for a new "Bill for regulating Tryals for Treason." As we have seen, he had already laboured to persuade the Commons to pass several previous Bills designed to remove the scandal of the old procedure in cases of High Treason. All these measures had been rejected or dropped. The present

¹ Anchitell Grey, X. 379.

² Ibid., 383.

³ Hasted's "Kent" (ed. 1790), III. 425 (note y).

1695/96 Bill passed the Commons in January 1695/6. The Lords, as on former occasions, added a clause providing that the Lord Steward's court for trying peers accused of treason should be constituted in the same manner during a recess as during session: i.e. that it should consist of the whole House of Lords. The Commons' refusal to agree to this clause had wrecked all former Bills for reforming Procedure in Cases of Treason. Sedley urged them on this occasion to accept it, arguing very justly that to compel a peer accused of High Treason to be tried by a court which would, in fact, be nominated by the Crown was to treat him worse than "the meanest commoner," who at any rate had the right of challenging his jury. Against the reasoning that nearly all the peers were connected with each other by blood-ties or affinities, and would so be biased in favour of a noble culprit, he pointed out humorously that the peerage were now accustomed to seek alliances in the City rather than among patrician families, and also that there was less to fear from the power of the nobility than formerly, because many of its members were "artificial" or landless lords—"like the Catholick Bishops in partibus infidelium." He recalled very appositely the Declaration of the Prince of Orange at the Revolution, "where nothing is more complained of and abhorred than the Injustice and Corruption of Tryals in King James's Reign." The conclusion of the speech proves that it was delivered at the beginning of the winter Session of 1695/6, for the speaker argues that the present House had hitherto passed nothing but money Bills, and that it was time for them "to do something like a Parliament of England."¹ These words would be seasonable in January 1695/6, when the High Treason Bill was the first piece of legislation unconcerned with finance that passed the House. The Bill, with the disputed clause, was carried in the Commons by a majority of forty-two, and received the Royal Assent on 21 January.

¹ "Miscellaneous Works," 1702 (Speeches, etc.), p. 21.

The General Election of December 1698 resulted in 1698 a kind of stalemate. Neither the ministerial Whigs nor the Tories gained many seats, but the body of independent Whigs who did not support the Ministry consistently came back to Westminster in considerable force. Sedley, who would probably have reckoned himself among the last-named group, was returned for New Romney with his old colleague, John Brewer.

One of the first questions to be discussed was that of the reduction of the land forces. The long struggle with France had come to an end with the Peace of Ryswick in September 1697, and the nation, with its profound mistrust of standing armies, was anxious to reduce the large war establishment as soon as possible. The King, on the other hand, who knew more about European politics than any of his subjects, could see that the peace was likely to be little more than a truce, and, in his opinion, a strong English army was necessary in order to maintain the position of equality with France which he had won for his adopted country. The Whig ministers, Somers and Montague, explained to their master the fanatical antipathy of the Commons to the idea of a large standing army. The King, who never understood the temper of the English Parliament, refused to heed their warning that, if a large military establishment were demanded of the Commons by the Ministry, there would be such an outburst of indignation that the House would probably vote the disbanding of the whole existing force. When the Commons went into Committee on the Army Vote, the ministers, having been unable to come to an agreement with the King, remained silent, and Harley, the Tory leader, moved the reduction of the land forces to 7000 men. Sir Charles Sedley made a remarkable speech in the debate that followed.¹ It was a succinct and temperate piece of reasoning, urging upon the House a com-

¹ "Miscellaneous Works," 1702 (Speeches, etc.), pp. 4-5. Macaulay's "History of England," ed. Firth, VI. 2864.

1698 promise between the King's view and that of the Opposition. He began by recalling the fact that he had always supported the Government during the long struggle with France, but proceeded to point out that the difference between those days and the present was a material one: "that was War, this is Peace." He then argued against the view of "those"—there is little doubt that he refers to the King and his advisers—who "think that England cannot be safe without a standing army of 30,000 men because France has 20,000." Against this reasoning, which he admitted would be unanswerable if England were a continental power, he asked the House to consider that, while we maintained a naval supremacy, no army could be very formidable to us, and demonstrated the difficulty of landing large forces in a hostile country by the examples of the Armada, the recent English attempts on Brest, and William's own landing in England at the Revolution, which, he said, could only have been permitted "by an infatuated prince." Finally, he suggested 10,000 men as a reasonable establishment, and the concluding sentence of his speech was an admirable expression of the spirit of the most sensible part of the nation.

"If we are true to our selves, 10000 Men are enough; if not, 100000 are too few." Unfortunately, the Government was too timid to consent to Sedley's proposal and Harley's vote for 7000 men was carried. The result was a long and painful struggle between King and Parliament, which might have been avoided if the King and his ministers had accepted Sedley's figure; for there is little doubt that the Commons would also have accepted it, if it had been supported by the ministers.

There is no record that Sedley spoke again in this Parliament. He kept his seat till his death in August 1701 1701, and was succeeded by Edward Goulston, probably a relative of the Sir William Goulston who had sat for New Romney in James II's Parliament. Goulston was returned with Sedley's old colleague, John Brewer, 1701 at the General Election of December 1701.¹

Sedley may be classed as one of the Old Whigs, who frequently voted with the Tories in the parliaments of William III. The following extract from Dr. Charles Davenant's "The True Picture of an Old Whig" describes his position fairly accurately. It is spoken by one of the "New Whigs," with whom such men as Sedley had little in common:—

"As for the Old Whigs in King Charles's time many of them are dead, some of them are retired, being ashamed to see their party play the knave as soon as ever they got into power. Many of those that still remain on the stage . . . vote every day with Seymour, Musgrave and Jack How. What have we in us that resembles the Old Whigs? They hated arbitrary government, we have all along been for a standing army: they desired triennial parliaments, and that trials for treason might be better regulated; and it is notorious that we opposed both those bills. They were for calling corrupt ministers to account; we have ever countenanced and protected corruption to the utmost of our power. They were frugal for the nation, and careful how they loaded the people with taxes; we have squandered away their money as though there could be no end of England's treasure."²

The chief glories of Sedley's parliamentary career are his campaign against the scandalous army of "placemen," and his long fight for the reform of the old inhuman procedure in trials for treason. He deserves an honourable place beside Edmund Waller and Andrew Marvell, the other two distinguished poets who sat and spoke in seventeenth century parliaments.

¹ Hasted's "Kent," I. 425.

² Dr. Charles Davenant, "Political and Commercial Works," ed. Whitworth, 1771. IV. 152.

CHAPTER IX

THE SEDLEYS AFTER THE REVOLUTION

"Sir Charles lived many years after the Revolution in full possession of his wit and humour and was an agreeable companion till his death."—"Biographia Britannica," s.a. Sir Charles Sedley.

"Au plaisir, maladroitement proscrit par le puritanisme, et déshonoré par les gens de la Restauration, il faut rendre sa place dans la vie sociale; en dépit de ses ennemis, en dépit surtout des ses amis, il faut le réhabiliter. Dans le plaisir, bien et largement compris, dans le plaisir délicat et intelligent, la raideur puritaine trouvera une détente nécessaire, et le soi-disant beau monde un dérivatif salutaire et durable à ses amusements grossiers et abjects."—Beljame: "Le Public et les Hommes de Lettres . . .," ed. 1897, p. 306, 7.

It is not easy for a rake to grow old gracefully; in fact, if he remains a rake, it is nearly impossible. The vices of youth can look almost charming through a glittering veil of freshness and laughter. Those of old age stand out in all their hideous nakedness. Even the minor sins of idleness and selfishness, which are often attractive or excusable in the young, appear hateful when they are found in company with grey hairs. Wycherley was far from being the satyr of Macaulay's caricature, but the spectacle of the old beau trying to maintain the same position among the wits of the new generation as that which he had held among his contemporaries thirty years before—and devoting all his time to that task—is not a pretty one. Sedley was saved from this fate, partly no doubt by his own good sense, and partly, perhaps, by the influence of Ann Ayscough. In 1688 he was forty-nine. During the remaining thirteen years of his life he continued to be a wit, a poet, and a good companion, but he also assumed two new characters which were far more appropriate to his years: those of an active and useful politician and an excellent father.

On 12 March, 1688/9,¹ shortly after King William's 1688/89 coronation, the son of Ann Ayscough, known as Charles Sedley, was knighted by the King. He is said to have been a minor when he received this honour, and, if born in 1672, would now be seventeen. It may be supposed that his father, as one of King William's earliest supporters, hastened to present his son at Court, and to obtain for him a knighthood, which, in those days, was usually conferred on the legitimate heirs of baronets, and might be considered to remove to some extent the stain of illegitimacy.

Sir Charles Sedley appears to have proved his loyalty to the new Government by giving it some financial support, to judge from a receipt signed by him for £4618 os. 8d., paid by Francis Villiers and the Tellers of Receipt of their Majesties' Exchequer, apparently in respect of a loan and interest.² Sedley may have lent this sum to the Prince of Orange when the Provisional Government was hard pressed for money before the assembly of the Convention. There is no date on the receipt, but it is written on the back of a scrap of a printed official document bearing the date of 6 November, 1689, so it is probable that the 1689 money was paid in the late autumn of that year.

¹ "Le Neve's Knights" (Harl. Soc.), p. 419.

² The exact wording of the receipt is as follows:—"Recd by me Charles Sedley of Francis Villiers Esq and of y^e Tellers of their Ma^{ties} Recpt of Excheq^r £4618:0:8 y^e sum of four thousand and Six hundred eighteen Pound eight Pence in full of Principall & interest of y^e wth in written [Orders?] (word cut through) Charles Sedley." This document is in the possession of Mr. G. Thorn Drury, who has kindly allowed me to see and copy it.

c.1688/89 It is at the Court of William III that we are able to catch our one glimpse of Sir Charles at divine service. Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph, one of the famous Seven who resisted James II, was Lord High Almoner after the Revolution and preached frequently at Court. He spent much of his time in elaborate and mystical speculations on biblical chronology, and his sermons were usually discourses on that subject, which did not lend itself to brevity. One Easter Day, Lloyd "being got into his chronology, which he had begun from the Creation," Sir Charles was slipping quietly out when he met Mulgrave coming in. "Well," said Mulgrave, "has he almost done?" "No," replied Sedley, "not by 1600 years, for he has got but to the Nativity yet."¹

1690-
1690/91 The measure of favour which Sir Charles enjoyed at Court does not seem to have lasted long. A coolness may well have arisen on account of his speech against the Government on the question of the "place-men" delivered on 31 March, 1690, which was printed and circulated widely.² Although the reference to the King himself in this speech is complimentary, the picture of him as the dupe of "crafty courtiers" could hardly have been pleasing to William. Soon afterwards Sedley fell under the suspicion of Jacobitism. In January 1690/91, his house in Bloomsbury Square was searched "upon an information that the Bishop of Ely was harboured there."³ This Bishop of Ely was the well-known non-juror, Francis Turner. After the Revolution he had refused to take the oaths to the new Government, and, later, entered into a treasonable correspondence with the Court of St. Germain. He was associated with Lords Preston, Dartmouth and Clarendon, and William Penn, the

¹ This anecdote is preserved in Bishop Hough's "Table-Talk," s.d. 19 January, 1742, printed in "Collectanea," Second Series, ed. Montagu Burrows, Oxford, 1890.

² See pp. 182-84.

³ Luttrell's "Brief Relation," II. 158.

Quaker, in the secret league of Protestant Jacobites, 1690 who sent a collection of messages to James in the Autumn of 1690, exhorting him to rely for his restoration on his Protestant subjects, and to abandon the idea of imposing Romanism on England by means of a French army. These papers, together with others containing useful information for the exiled Court, had been seized by Lord Danby, son of the Lord President, Caermarthen, on 31 December, 1690. One of the messengers who carried them, and who was arrested by Danby, was Lord Preston, brother of Colonel James Grahame of Kendal, James's confidant and Katherine Sedley's friend. Among the papers was a letter from the Countess of Dorchester to her royal lover, containing a desperate appeal for money for herself and her daughter.¹ From this circumstance it may be supposed that Katherine was to some extent associated with the conspiracy.² It is possible that her father took pity on her destitute condition, and that she went to stay with him at Bloomsbury Square, where she may have received the Bishop of Ely and other Jacobite conspirators.

William was not the man to take vengeance on a woman who was, after all, only demanding what was due to her from her lover, and Lady Dorchester, whom nothing could abash, appeared boldly at the new Court. Observing that Queen Mary "looked coldly upon her," she remarked that "if it was upon her father's account, she hoped she would remember that,

¹ Macaulay, "History," ed. Firth, IV. 694.

² It is possible that she joined the conspiracy as a spy in the interests of King William. According to a letter of Nottingham to William dated 15 July, 1690 (printed in Dalrymple's "Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland," 4to, 1773, Vol. III., Appendix, Pt. II. p. 108), information concerning the plans of the Jacobite party had been given to Nottingham by the Countess of Dorchester and Mr. James Grahame; shortly before the letter was written the latter had taken the oaths to King William. See also Finch MSS. (Hist. MSS. Comm., 1922), pp. 360, 391, 392.

- 1690 as she had broke one commandment with him, her Majesty made no scruple of breaking another; therefore (she) thought they were even on that score."¹
- c. 1691 The Countess also attended the Court of the Princess Anne of Denmark, the Queen's sister, in "grate splendor," covered with diamonds, and no doubt the "shocking creature"² glared at her old rival, Sarah Jennings, now Lady Churchill and bosom friend of the Princess. She seems to have found some favour in the eyes of King William, and, by the help of the Duke of Shrewsbury, succeeded in obtaining from him a private audience. A contemporary³ considered that he was not "in love with her," but that he "feared the lash of her tounge, soe chooses not to anger her." Whatever the politic Dutchman's reasons may have been for conciliating the Countess, there is no doubt that he ordered that she should receive a pension of £1500 a year.⁴ Possibly he took the view that she was, in her way, a sufferer for the Protestant cause. Katherine's comment was that "she knew not well, very well what shee would wish might happen, for both the queenes us'd her badly, and both kinges, she said, were civil to her."

¹ Lord Dartmouth's note to Burnet's "History of his Own Times," III. 13, 14, ed. 1824. The Countess obviously intends the seventh and fifth commandments.

² See p. 136, note 2.

³ The contemporary in question is a lady (otherwise unknown) who seems to have been a mistress of James II and rival to Lady Dorchester. All the information in this paragraph is derived from a most interesting letter written by this lady to the exiled King and printed in the Gentleman's Magazine in October 1802. It was sent to Mr. Urban by a writer signing himself "Historicus," who claimed to have found it among "some papers of Dr. Stukely." The text is followed by the words: [This is a true copy of a letter found in a shoe heele in my shopp at Grantham. Phillip Cooke.] The letter is dated "May the 29th." I conjecture that the year is 1691, for the public, apparently, learned that Katherine was to receive a pension from William III on 1 May, 1691. See note 4 below.

⁴ Luttrell's "Brief Relation," II. 220, s.d. 1 May, 1691. A receipt for £400 "being one quarter's allowance for her daughter Katherine Darnley" dated 27 May, 1691, is extant (Bodl., Rawl. A. 306, 268).

Proof of Sir Charles Sedley's temporary disgrace, 1691 and also of his desire to regain the King's favour, is to be found in a letter from him to the Earl of Dorset, now Lord Chamberlain. This letter, which is undated, is preserved among the Sackville family papers,¹ and must have been written towards the end of October 1691, as it refers to the imminent death of Major-General Kirke (the Kirke of Tangiers and the Western Rebellion), who died on 31 October, 1691.²

"MY LORD,

I am told that Major General Kirke is either dead or very neare it: soe the office of house keeper at Whitehall will suddainly bee in the dispose either of the king or your lordship. The vallew of it is Six hundred a year, which will helpe me to pay the taxes wee must give this Sessions and I am afrayd for many Yeares more yet: I am neither ambitious nor covetous, and only desire to put myselfe by his Maj[esties] favor in the Condition I was before these extraordinary tho I confess most necessary payments. the place is under your lordship, whom I shall find noe difficulty to obey. I [h]ope you will be soe kind to show my request to his Majesty before he bee otherwise engaged, my lord Sydney will second you as also lord Devonshire: if you espouse my cause warmly I doubt not but I shall prevayle, these are things that other men obtane for their friends and I cannot see why your lordships mediation should not be as effectuall as any mans for one of yours, especially the place being under you if not in your dispose: I thought ¹ This letter is calendared in the Hist. MSS. Comm., Appendix to 4th Report, p. 281. I have been allowed to read, copy and reproduce the original by the kindness of its present owner, Lord Sackville of Knole Park, Kent.

² D. N. B., s.a. Kirke, Major-General.

1691 to have spoken to you last night but you slept off to bed ere I was aware. Tho I am an old friend and servant I will be ready to make any present where your lordship shall direct, for I am not ignorant at what [ra]te these favours are sought after.

Your Most humble and faithful

servant

CHAR[LES] SEDLEY."¹

There is something pathetic in the mixture of flattery and earnestness in this appeal to an old friend and playmate. It is a melancholy fact that Dorset—in spite of his famous “good nature”—does not seem to have troubled to exert himself on Sedley’s behalf. Kirke was succeeded by his son, who held the post of House-keeper at Whitehall till that palace was burnt in 1697/8.

1691/92 In May 1692, Sir Charles seems to have made an attempt to regain the royal favour by writing a pretty Ode for Queen Mary’s birthday. It was set to music by the greatest contemporary English musician, and probably sung to the Queen on her birthday morning. Peter Motteux printed it in his “Gentleman’s Journal, or the New Monthly Miscellany,” for May 1692. This periodical, first issued in January 1691/2, was one of the earliest English literary journals. Sedley was a frequent contributor, and was probably acquainted with Motteux, a literary free-lance of the period, still remembered for his excellent translation of “Don Quixote.”

On 19 November, 1692, Sedley’s old friend, Thomas Shadwell, died at his house at Chelsea.² Through Dorset’s influence he had been appointed Poet Laureate after the Revolution, when Dryden as a Catholic and a Jacobite lost his official position. 1691/92 This great merry tun of a man, who continued to write jolly, racy comedies to the end, seems to have had a real affection for Sedley, who had probably helped him materially in the hard times (for a Whig poet) before the Revolution. He mentions Sir Charles in touching language in his will, appointing him trustee for his widow and leaving him a gold ring "weighing twenty shillings," with the motto "memor esto tui."¹

¹ Letters enclosed in square brackets are partially or wholly effaced in the original.

² D. N. B., s.a. Thomas Shadwell.

Sir Charles must have regained King William's 1694 favour by the spring of 1694. There was probably some connection between this reconciliation and his speech in the Commons on 5 December, 1693, when he urged on the House the necessity of maintaining a standing army.² There was no surer way to William's friendship than to aid him in any conceivable manner in his lifelong struggle with the power of France. On 8 May it was rumoured in London that Sir Charles Sedley was going to be created an English Viscount.³ This rumour probably represents the intention of the Government. Why it was never carried into effect remains a mystery. Perhaps Sedley again threw away his chances by some plain speaking in the Commons. It is worthy of notice that on 10 May the Earl of Mulgrave, Sir Charles's old enemy, was created Marquis of Normanby.

During these years Sir Charles Sedley was probably occupied a good deal with the education of his son by Ann Ayscough. This young man, though he seems to have had no literary ambitions, was intelligent and affectionate. Old Tom D'Urfey, writer of innumerable songs and plays, and a sort of privileged jester among the Wits, had known Sedley from his youth, and was

¹ MS. Notes formerly in the possession of Col. Prideaux, now in the collection of Mr. G. Thorn Drury.

² See p. 197.

³ Luttrell's "Brief Relation," III. 307, s.d. 8 May, 1694.

1695 probably a frequent visitor at the house in Bloomsbury Square. Writing some years later he describes the relationship between the elder and the younger Sedley as one which might serve as a model to all sons and fathers: "there being more between you than the Ordinary Duty and Love Incumbent between Father and Son, an entire, free and easie Friendship—Submission and Satisfaction on your [the son's] side—and Contentment with Pleasure on his [the father's]."¹ These words call up a very charming picture of the elder Sir Charles walking and reading with a young man who had replaced the conventional awe of seventeenth-century children towards their parents by a frank and affectionate comradeship. No doubt the lad was taken by his father to Will's Coffee House, and there presented to the great Mr. Dryden as he sat in his armchair in the sunshine on the balcony, taking snuff and laying down the law to a hushed circle of powdered and periwigged admirers. As there is no record that the younger Sir Charles entered either of the Universities, it is probable that he was educated by a tutor at home under his father's supervision. This tutor may have been the Rev. Laurence Echard, who dedicated an excellent translation of three comedies of Plautus to Sir Charles Sedley senior in 1694.

If the younger Sir Charles did not inherit his father's literary talent, he seems to have had a full share of his audacity and hot blood. He fell in love with Frances Newdigate, a girl of eighteen, third daughter of Sir Richard Newdigate, a Warwickshire baronet, and married her without the knowledge either of his father or Sir Richard, at the lady's home at Arbury in Warwickshire, on 8 May, 1695.² Sir Richard was a man of an arbitrary disposition and a fiery temper, and his daughter probably feared 1695 that he would refuse his consent to a marriage with a young man of illegitimate birth who was entirely dependent on his father's bounty. The younger Sir Charles came to London after the marriage, and took the wise course of asking his father's old friend, the Earl of Dorset, now Lord Chamberlain, to break the news to Sir Charles Sedley senior, and help him to make his peace with his father. Dorset seems to have consented, and probably won Sir Charles's forgiveness easily. The latter was not likely to be harsh on the escapades of a high-spirited young man. The real difficulty was to approach Sir Richard Newdigate, from whom the young couple naturally expected a dowry. The elder Sir Charles resolved to make use of a common friend, and chose a certain Sir Thomas Rowe for the purpose. His letter to that gentleman (written in July 1695) is a model of diplomatic caution:¹

¹ Epistle Dedicatory to "The Intrigues of Versailles, or a Jilt in All Humours" (4to, 1697).

² Lady A. E. Newdegate-Newdigate's "Cavalier and Puritan," p. 191.

"Sr

Since I saw you my Lord Chamberlain came to me and truly surprized me with the news of my son's being actually married to Mrs. Frances Newdigate. It is a matter that ought to be more considered off and not thus transacted without the privity or consent of parents. I was very angry with my son for his proceeding in this matter with such precipitation—not that I have not all the value imaginable for the young lady and for the Character all the world gives Sr Richard Newdigate of a very honorable, worthy and judicious person. But I think (as 1695 perhaps he may) that the young couple ought not to have gone so far, but have waited for our Consent, upon which their well being so much depends. After his many submissions I have forgiven my Son, and shall do all I can to make the young couple easy. I hope S^r you will do them both good offices with S^r Richard and make the discovery to him with all alleviating circumstances so rash an action will admit of. I know this is too much trouble to impose on you upon so slender an acquaintance, but necessity must be my excuse, having not the good fortune to know anyone who is like to see S^r Richard Newdigate but yourself.

¹ It is preserved among the Newdigate family papers, and has been printed by Lady A. E. Newdegate-Newdigate in her "Cavalier and Puritan," p. 191. It was probably given by Sir T. Rowe to Sir R. Newdigate and was endorsed by him "18 July 1695 Sr C. S. senior to Sr Thomas Rowe about his sons marrying Frank (i.e. Frances) without his or my consent."

Y^r most faithful humble servant

CHARLES SEDLEY."

The mediation of Sir Thomas seems to have been successful, and soon after,¹ Sir Charles Sedley wrote directly to Sir Richard Newdigate as follows:—

"S^r

I am sorry your Daughter continues so ill, having a nearer concern in her now then I expected so suddenly. Since my last to you My Lord Chamberlain told me my son and the young lady were actually married. I confess it surprised me, and I was very angry that he did not wait for yours as well as my consent in a matter of so much importance to us all. I believe he chose to break it to me by my Lord rather than tell it to me himself, concluding that the great Value I have for my Lord could not but much abate my resentment, especially when he became his advocate. As soon after as possible I writ to Sir Thomas Rowe to entreat him to represent the whole matter to you in the best

¹ This letter is undated. It is printed in "Cavalier and Puritan," p. 193.

circumstances so rash an action would admit of. 1695
 I had not curiosity enough to enquire into my son's motives, nor can I dwell with pleasure on the arguments till I receive your Judgment and apprehensions of it, which I hope will be the same with mine: which are since it is now past remedy, that we should transact together for the ease and comfort of the young couple, and mutually endeavour to satisfy each other as well as their reasonable expectations. If the young lady's condition of health will bear such a Journey, we think here that change of air, together with the help of our London doctors, might further her recovery. But you, S^r, are the best and properest Judge.

Your most faithful and humble servant

CHARLES SEDLEY.

Give my blessing to my Daughter and service to all the rest of your Good Family, if you think fit."

Sir Charles's affection for his son, mingled with a determination to mollify Sir Richard, can be read in every line of this letter. It is impossible to believe that his "resentment" can have been very formidable, and the closing sentences are doubtless an artful plea to obtain for the bridegroom the presence of his beloved. The bride had certainly fallen ill after the wedding and her husband also seems to have been ailing. The following letter is the only extant composition by that young man. It is addressed to Sir Richard Newdigate and docketed by the Warwickshire baronet "Sir C. S. junior, his excuse for marrying Frank without my Consent."

"S^r

Had not my illness prevented my writing I had before presented my humble duty and 1695 thanks for your great kindness to me, and begged your pardon for my presumption in marrying your daughter without acquainting you with it. I hope I shall always carry myself with that great Submission and duty, you will easily pardon a fault my infinite passion for your daughter made me Commit. I shall be at Banbury next Friday night and there S^r Thomas Rowe will do me the favour to meet me, and he will wait on you with

Yr most dutiful and obedient Son,

CHARLES SEDLEY.

Tuesday 16th July, 1695."

Sir Richard, softened no doubt by the illness of the bride and bridegroom, seems to have forgiven them at length, and to have recognised the younger Sedley as his son-in-law, though complications between the two families were to follow later.

The summer in which the younger Sir Charles Sedley won his bride saw one of the most stirring incidents in the gigantic struggle between William III and Louis XIV. In July 1692 the French armies, with their King at their head and the great Vauban as their Chief Engineer, had taken the fortress of Namur, hitherto considered impregnable, and Boileau had celebrated the feat in lyric strains. In 1695 the tide which had flowed so steadily against William all his life began to turn. Luxembourg, the greatest of French Marshals, was dead, and the generalissimo of Louis's forces in Flanders was Villeroy, a Court favourite with hardly a single qualification for high command. His lieutenants, Boufflers and Catinat, were able generals, but were hampered by the feeble leadership of the commander-in-chief. William had set his heart on retaking Namur, which he rightly regarded as the key to Flanders, and spent the opening of the campaigning season of 1695 in 1695 feinting in order to conceal his true objective from Villeroy. So well did he succeed that, at the beginning of July, while his lieutenant, the Prince de Vaudemont, was holding the French commander in check, he succeeded in driving Boufflers with a large force into Namur, and opened the siege of that city on 2 July. Numerous and heavy bets were laid on the issue of this siege in London.¹ The occasion was probably one of the first of many similar ones when the sporting instincts of the English people expressed themselves in this way. Sir Charles Sedley, whose expenses must have been considerably increased by the necessity of having to maintain a grown-up son, was not averse from the idea of gaining a sum of ready money in a gentlemanly way. He laid a wager which must have been one of the earliest connected with the siege, for it seems to have turned on the question whether Namur was actually invested or not. That he was not above using his friendship with the Earl of Dorset to obtain information in a way that would not now be considered strictly honourable is, unfortunately, proved by a note in his handwriting, preserved among the Sackville papers.² This scrap of paper, which has survived by pure accident, may have been handed to Dorset by a servant as he sat among his friends one evening at Knole, and thrown carelessly by the Earl into a drawer. It may be dated perhaps in the first week of July 1695:—

“If I did not misunderstand your Lordship you told us at dinner that the king had besiegd Namur pray doe me the favour to let me receive a line or tow whither or noe it bee besiegd, for

¹ L’Hermitage, agent of the States General in England, quoted by Macaulay, “History of England,” ed. Firth, V. 2530.

² At the Public Record Office. I am allowed to copy and reproduce it by the kindness of Lord Sackville.

1695 I have layd a small wager: which I may get off from, or add to, ackording to your answer: I will not show your lordships hand to any one.
 Your most humbl
 Servant

CHARLES SEDLEY."

Both the writer and the recipient would probably have been amazed had they known that this note was going to keep alive the memory of a small mean deed for two hundred years.

The Countess of Dorchester, having obtained her pension from King William, was determined to defend her rights to the utmost. A Bill was introduced into the Commons in January 1695 to reward the popular admiral, the Earl of Torrington, with large grants of lands. Among the lands that it was proposed to give to the successful sailor were some of the domains that had been assigned to the Countess by James II. Katherine appeared at the bar of the House in person on 18 January,¹ to lodge her protest, and gave a long account of her wrongs. The House, probably moved by her wit and courage, added a clause to the Bill in March granting her £4000 arrears and an annuity of £600.² On 20 August, 1696, she took a further step towards consolidating her position in respectable society by marrying Sir David Colyear,³ a Scottish baronet, "very much a man of honour," who had served with distinction under William III in Flanders. The capture of this hardened veteran was Dorinda's crowning achievement. Dorset celebrated the feat in the last of his cycle of squibs on the 1696-99 Countess:

¹ Luttrell's "Brief Relation," 18 January, 1695, IV. 6.

² Ibid., IV. 29.

³ Luttrell's "Brief Relation," IV. 99, s.d. 20 August, 1696. Macky in his "Characters" (quoted in D. N. B., s.a. Colyear, Sir David) gives the following description of Colyear "towards fifty years old": "he is one of the best foot officers in the world; is very brave and bold; hath a great deal of wit; very much a man of honour and nice in that way, yet married the Countess of Dorchester and had by her a very good estate; pretty well shaped, dresses clean, has but one eye."

"Proud with the Spoils of Royal Cully,
With false pretence to Wit and Parts,
She swaggers like a batter'd Bully,
To try the tempers of Men's Hearts.
Tho she appear as glitt'ring fine,
As Gems, and Jests, and Paint can make her;
She ne'er can win a Breast like mine,
The Devil and Sir David take her."¹

¹ "Poems on Affairs of State," Vol. III., "printed in the year 1704," p. 440. The following is a MS. version of this poem and the verses on Lady Dorchester already quoted, which is preserved in the Bodleian (Bodl., Add. MS. A. 301, f. 194). It contains an additional stanza which, I believe, has never been printed:—

"Dorsett on Dorchest^r.

I

Dorinda's Sparkling witt & eyes,
United caste too feirie a light;
W^{ch} Blazes high but quickly dyes,
Warmes not ye Heart, but hurts ye sight.

2

Love is a calme and tender Joy
Kind are his lookes and soaft his pace,
Her Cupid is a Black-Guard Boy,
Who runs his Linke into yo^r face.

3

Proud of ye spoyles of Roy^{ll} Cully,
Wth false p^rtence to witt and parts,
She swaggers like a Batterd Bully;
To trye ye temper of o^r Hearts.

4

Tho she appears as Gay, & fine
As Jests, and Gems & Paint can make her;
She ne're shall win a heart like mine,
The Devill, or S^r Davy take her.

5

Her Bed is like y^e Scripture feast,
Where none whoe were invited came,
Soe disappoynted of her Guest,
She took up wth y^e Blind and Lame."

1696-99 Another contemporary lampoon gives a vivid if malicious picture of the Countess in 1698, and was probably written by someone who had come under the lash of her wit:—

“A wither’d Countess next, who rails aloud
At the reigning Vices of the Croud (sic),
And with the product of that ill turn’d Brain,
Does all her guests at Visits Entertain;
Thinks it a crime for any one to be Either ill-Natur’d or as lewd as she.
A Sovereign Judge over her Sex does sit,
Giving full Scope to her injurious Wit.
Too old for Lust and proof against all Shame,
Her only business now is to defame;
She hath done well the one ey’d Knight to chuse,
For one, who’s two wou’d ne’r endure the noose.”¹

On 1 June, 1699, Sir David was created Earl of Portmore. He had two sons by Lady Dorchester, the elder of whom became the second Earl of Portmore. When they were sent to school, the mother is said to have given them the following characteristic piece of advice:—“If any body call either of you the son of a, you must bear it; for you are so: but if they call you bastards, fight till you die; for you are an honest man’s sons.”²

1696 In the spring of 1696 the mysterious suspicion of Jacobitism cast upon Sir Charles seems to have been revived. If it had any foundation in fact, he was only doing the same as hundreds of other prudent, if unheroic, persons in corresponding with the Court of St. Germain. Everybody knew that a restoration of

¹ From a poem entitled “Answer to J. Pulteney’s Letter, Why I do not let my Wife keep some sort of Company, 1698,” which occurs on f. 198 of a folio MS. formerly the property of Sir William Augustus Frazer. It was copied by Mr. Thorn Drury, who kindly communicated it to me. The second line is probably defective and, perhaps, the original reading was “At all the reigning Vices,” etc.

² Jesse’s “Memoirs of the Courts of England under the Stuarts,” III. 507-8. Jesse quotes no authority for this anecdote. It must be genuine: no one but Katherine could have made such a remark.

King James II was possible, and that such a restoration would probably be followed by a campaign of confiscation and proscription far more terrible even than that which followed Sedgemoor. Whatever the truth of the matter may be, Sedley's name certainly occurs in notes on persons suspected of Jacobitism, dated "March to June, 1696," compiled by the great Whig leader, the Duke of Shrewsbury,¹ who himself, in a moment of weakness, trafficked with agents of King James. It should, of course, be remembered that Jacobite informers in the reign of William III frequently accused entirely innocent persons in order to divert suspicion from the real conspirators.

In spite of these suspicions, Sedley seems to have been on good terms with King William in 1696. Before the King left England for Holland on 7 May, 1696, he told Sir Charles that he "would let him know to whom he should apply as to a promise formerly made."² In a letter dated 23 June in the same year, the Duke of Shrewsbury, at Sedley's request, reminded the King of this promise. What the promise was can only be guessed. If it referred to the title of Viscount (as the words "formerly made" may imply), Sir Charles was destined to be disappointed, for he died a commoner.

A good deal of dispute seems to have arisen in the autumn of 1696 between the Sedleys and the Newdigates concerning the knotty question of "settlements." An extract from Sir Richard Newdigate's Diary, dated November 1696, throws some light on the quarrel:

"Paid my daughter Sedley's maid £1. Sir Charles Sedley refuses to pay her upon pretence that I will not pay my Daughter's Portion, whereas the true case is this; young Sir Chas. married my daughter Frank without my consent,

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., Report on MSS. of Duke of Buccleuch & Shrewsbury, Vol. II. Pt. I. p. 320.

² Cal. State Papers, 1696, p. 239.

1696 as was acknowledged both by his Father and him (see their letters in Walnut Scritoire drawer F for Frank). Yet I am willing to pay £5000 and assign him a £1000 Debt, if he will make a settlement, viz. Stand to his Word, for he said he would not give sixpence away from his Son. Now I desire to have two thirds of his estate settled viz. £2000 per ann., but he will settle only one. The Base usage I have had makes me resolve not to pay the Portion this two years; viz. the Father threatening me, the Mother and Son slandering me and my children, and the son threatening to put a spoke in Phill's (Amphillis, Sir Richard's eldest daughter) cart and accordingly traducing us all."¹

It is interesting to learn from this private outburst of Sir Richard that the estate of the elder Sir Charles in 1696 was about £3000 a year. Father Bede's estimate about 1670, it will be remembered, was £4000. The mention of Ann Ayscough by Sir Richard Newdigate shows that she was a firm upholder of her son's interests.

1697 About February 1697, old Tom D'Urfey's rollicking farce, "The Intrigues of Versailles, or a Jilt in All Humours," was staged at the Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre. As it was dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley and his son, it may be supposed that the Sedleys attended the first performance, accompanied, it is to be hoped, by "Frank." On such occasions the elder Sir Charles must have entertained his son and daughter-in-law with reminiscences of the great days of the Restoration theatre, and told them of the glories of Hart, Mohun, Nell Gwynne, Mary Knipp and other stars of his youth.

The negotiations concerning the financial future of the younger Sir Charles Sedley and his wife apparently came to a head in June 1697.¹ On the 29th of that 1697 month a marriage settlement between the two families was signed. In legal language it was between "Sir Charles Sedley Bart. of Southfleet, of first part, the Earl of Scarborough and Sir Richard Newdigate of second part, Sir Charles Sedley the younger knt son of the said Sir Charles and Dame Frances, the wife of the said Sir Charles S the younger and one of the daughters of Sir Richard Newdigate of third part and Richard Newdigate, Joseph Ayloff and Stoughton Bird of fourth part." The details of this settlement have not been recorded. The inclusion of Joseph Ayloff of Gray's Inn among the signatories is significant. He was the husband of Frances Ayscough, daughter of Henry Ayscough of Yorkshire, and sister to Ann Ayscough. His son, William, was at this time a young lieutenant of foot, who had published some pretty lyrics, and appears to have become a great favourite of Sir Charles on his return to England at the Peace of Ryswick.²

¹ "Cavalier and Puritan," p. 195.

In January of the following year, Whitehall Palace 1698 was burned to the ground. The great rambling mass of buildings had now for some time been deserted by the Court, which was transferred by William III to his beloved Kensington, but its demolition must have been a melancholy sight for those who had seen it in the brilliant days when its halls and galleries were trodden by Castlemaine, Portsmouth, Rochester and Buckingham. Scarcely less striking as a sign of the changed times was the presentation in the same year by Sir Charles Sedley (who had once "abused

¹ "Fly Leaves, No. IV.," by "Eu. Hood," Gentleman's Magazine, October 1822.

² He was probably the poet's literary executor. In his preface to the 1702 edition of Sedley's Miscellaneous Poems, he says, "The Affinity between Sir Charles Sedley and me, gave me the first Honour of his Acquaintance; and his own Candour and Indulgence continued me in it during that Interval of Peace we have since enjoy'd" (i.e. after the Peace of Ryswick in September 1697).

1698 the scriptures") and John Brewer, Esquire, of a gift of plate to the church of New Romney, the town which they represented in Parliament. The gift consisted of "A Pair of tall gilt flagons (with shaped lids and spreading circular feet) and a rudely-fashioned deep cup without knop on the stem."¹

By January of the next year the Sedleys and Newdigates appear to have become completely reconciled, to judge from a letter written by Sir Charles in that month to Sir Richard Newdigate:²—

Endorsed

1698/99

"Sir Ch. Sedley Father of S^r Ch. Sedley who married Frances Daughter of S^r Rich Newdigate 2d Bt.

12 Jan: 169 $\frac{8}{9}$ S^r Ch. Sedley a Letter of Freindship

S^r

The country beeing as busy and delightfull a scene to you, as the towne to me, I doubt wee shall not meet soe often as I could wish, this consideration obliges me to trouble you with a letter. Frindship beares sometimes bitter fruit, but it has not a more aggreable flower than an amicable Correspondence: which I shall ever preserve with you, as a person whoe in a nice and difficult emergency, have behavd your selfe to mine and the satisfaction of all persons unprejudisd My sonne was sisd upon by the Gout as hee was going to bring your dauter up to London, of which hee is still lame, but shee is expected by the next Coach which comes from those parts: you have the votes of the house 1698/99

¹ "Archæologica Cantiana," 13. 479.

² This and the subsequent letters are among the family papers of Sir Francis Newdigate, Bart., of Arbury, Warwickshire, who has kindly allowed me to copy and publish them.

 but what passes at Committees may bee news to you, this day we went into a Committee of the whole house upon a bill presented by S^r
 John Philips, entitled an act to prevent debauchery and profanes: after some pains and penátys agreed to against persons keeping or frequenting bawdy houses: wee came to a clause concerning such women as should bee convicted of adultery it was provided that they should pay such cases the summ of 100 l or be publicly whipt: Some gentlemen tooke exception at the fine, which could not but light upon the husband: whoe was not only the Injured but an innocent person: and perhaps willing enough to put his horns in his pocket therefore to make him pay for his own disgrace was thought very hard: the Committee thought the clause deservd a further Consideration: it beeing about 3 a clocke they adjourned to a farther day: I wish wee had you amongst us for there seems to bee a spirit in this parlament which if well directed might bee serviceable to the nation.
 Doctor Daveñat hath obligd the world with an other booke but I fear disobligd some of our great men, hee is going agent to Fort St
 George, for the Old East India company: for 3 yeares if you have any comands for me in towne
 you shall find me S^r

Your most faithfull and humble
 Servant

CH. SEDLEY.

All here present their most humble
 Service to you and your family."

It is rather surprising to find the hero of the Cock Tavern affair and the friend of Rochester discussing a Bill to prevent debauchery and profaneness. This 1698/99 measure was part of the new Puritanism of the reign of William III, which formed Vigilance Societies and prosecuted actors for using profane words on the stage. It was passed on 26 February and was one of several attempts of the so-called "Reformers of Manners" to make the nation moral by legislation.¹ The Dr. Davenant to whom Sedley refers is Dr. Charles Davenant (1656–1714), a son of Sir William Davenant, the poet, and himself a distinguished writer on economics. The book with which he had recently "obliged the world" was his "Discourses on the Public Revenues and Trade of England," in which he explains the reforms which he had introduced while Commissioner of the Excise from 1678–89, and animadverts on the conduct of his successors after the Revolution. He was answered in "Remarks on Some Wrong Confutations and Conclusions" (1698).²

1699 In 1699 Sir Charles the elder must have felt that he had not many years of life before him, for, in this year, in accordance with the prudent traditions of his family, he made a final settlement of his estate. The deed in which this settlement was embodied was dated 13 September, 1699, and it gives a striking proof of Sir Charles's affection for his son by Ann Ayscough. The bulk of the estate was made over to this young man, with the reservation of life estates for Sir Charles the elder and the faithful Ann Ayscough.³ The rest of the document consisted of limitations of the reversion of the whole estate in case of the death of Sir Charles or his son. The reversion was limited firstly to Sir Charles himself; secondly, to Ann Ayscough, "one of the daurs. of Henry Ayscough

¹ Luttrell's "Brief Relation," IV. 606, and Krutch's "Comedy and Conscience after the Restoration" (Chap. VII.), where a good account of the "Reformation of Manners" will be found.

² D. N. B., s.a. Davenant, Dr. Charles.

³ Fly-leaves, No. IV.

Esquire late of Grays Inn Gent decd.”; thirdly, to 1699 “Sir Charles S of the par. of St. Giles-in-the-Fields Middx. Knt.”; fourthly, “to issue of Sir C. S. knt”; fifthly, “to the use of the Rt. honorable Katherine Countess of Dorchester for life”; sixthly (this is unkind to poor Dorinda!), “to her issue lawfully begotten”; seventhly, “to Sir Charles Sedley of St. Clere in the Co. of Kent”; eighthly, “to his issue.”¹ The real object of the settlement is disclosed by a final proviso, that “if the Countess of Dorchester or any present or future husband or their issue attempt to avoid, annul, impeach, etc. that settlement, all the uses limited to them should determine and be void.”² Sir Charles doubtless feared that if he merely left his fortune to his son by will, Lady Dorchester or her husband would attempt to contest the validity of such a will before the courts, where juries would be likely to look with disfavour on the disinheritance of a legitimate in favour of an illegitimate child, and would be inclined to listen to the suggestion that the Ayscoughs had used undue influence in procuring a will in their favour. A settlement made while the poet was in good health, putting his son into possession of the greater part of the property, would be far more difficult to upset, and the final proviso removed any possibility of legal action against it. It is dangerous to read too much into legal documents, but surely we can clearly perceive here the results of a bitter feud between the daughter of the unfortunate Lady Sedley and the son of the woman who took her mother’s place.

The younger Charles Sedley had three children by his wife Frances. They were named Charles, Richard and Anne. I can find no record of the ¹ Haslewood’s Notes to Jacob, No. 11: see Appendix I. The italics are mine. Sir Charles Sedley of St. Clere was the poet’s third cousin and son of Sir John Sedley of Igham St. Cleers; see pp. 22–23 and pedigree.

² Haslewood’s Notes, No. (11), Appendix I.

1699 dates of their births. One of the elder Sedley's last business transactions before he made over his estate to his son seems to have been the sale of Harefield Park in Middlesex to Sir Richard Newdigate, the father of his daughter-in-law. Harefield had belonged to the Newdigates about a century before, and had been exchanged by them for Arbury in Warwickshire. It probably came to Sir Charles from his sister-in-law, Lady Chandos. It will be remembered that long before, in the year of the Restoration, Harefield House is said to have been burned by Sir Charles's carelessness while he was staying with Lady Chandos. On Saturday, 1 July, 1699, Sir Richard was in London and called on Sir Charles, and on that day and on Monday, 3rd, the details of the sale seem to have been arranged between the two baronets.¹ Richard Sedley, the younger son of the younger Sir Charles, accompanied his grandfather to the sea-coast when the latter set out on a tour in France in July 1699. The old gentleman notes in his Diary that he "tipped" little Dick Sedley a quarter of a Carolus (about five shillings) before embarking.

Our last glimpse of Sedley in a convivial society and in connection with the stage belongs to the year 1699. The famous comic actor Penkethman published in this year an "Epistle Dedicatory" to a play called "Love without Interest or the Man too Hard for the Master" (4to London 1699). In this curious document he gives a list of the names of the Gentlemen with whom he associated, or, in his own words, among whom he "thrust in his Comick Phyz" and it is pleasant to find "Sir Charles Sidley" among them.²

1699/ At the beginning of the following year we find 1700 Sedley again writing to inform his friend Sir Richard Newdigate of the news of the town:—

¹ "Cavalier and Puritan" (Sir R. Newdigate's Diary), p. 314.

² I am indebted to Mr. Thorn Drury for this interesting reference.

Endorsed "27 Jan: 1 $\frac{699}{700}$ S^r Ch.

1699/
1700

Sedley y^t ye Lds had reversed ye Judgmt
Ag^t ye Bankers

For The Honorable S^r
Richard Newdigate at Arbury Warwickshire
Charles Sedley
Free

from the Speakers Chamber Case paper Jan the 28

S^r

I have often beene obligd to write to you upon occasions distastful to us both. I am now well pleased with an Opportunity of informing you of something that may bee agreeable—which is that the house of lords on tuesday last: in favor of tho[s]e concernd in the Bankers debt reverse my lord Chancellors decree against them: by a great majority: and tis the general opinion that King Charles The 2^d had (by the words of the act that gave him the Excise on beer and ale) a power to dispose of that revenue for ever. soe as to have sold it or given it away. if soe the Engagment hee made stands good. and thee debt must one time or other bee satisfyd out of the revenue: I hope we shall cutt off one sh: in the pownd from the land tax by reason the Irish resumptions will assist us to pay our debt: and that 2 shills will answer the current Service of this year 7000 thousand men beeing our complement as well for service at land as sea

Your most humble servant

CHARLES SEDLEY."

The judgment of the House of Lords "in favor of 1699/
those concernd in the Bankers debt" mentioned in 1700 this letter was a remote sequel of Charles II's famous 1699/ "closing of the Exchequer" in 1672. By that act the 1700 King had appropriated about a million and a half of money which should have been applied for the repayment of loans granted by the bankers. Instead of repaying the money Charles paid the bankers interest at the rate of 6 per cent. and certain annuities, which were charged on the revenue. These payments were made up till the end of Charles's reign, but James II and William III both refused to recognise the obligation. The bankers petitioned the Barons of the Exchequer for arrears in the reign of William III and the Attorney-General demurred. The Court of the Exchequer upheld the bankers' contention and directed that the arrears should be paid. The Attorney-General appealed by means of a Writ of Error to a court called the Court of Exchequer Chamber, the functions of which were to review the judgments of the Barons of the Exchequer, and almost all the judges in this Court adhered to the judgment already given in favour of the bankers. Chief Justice Treby, however, opposed it on the ground that the remedy by petition was inapplicable. His opinion was upheld by Somers, then Lord Chancellor, who reversed the decision of the Barons of the Exchequer, much to the dismay, no doubt, of persons like Sir Richard Newdigate, who probably had money on deposit with the bankers and would naturally await the repayment with some anxiety. Sedley refers to the last stage of the proceedings, when a Writ of Error on Somers's reversal was brought before the House of Lords, which reversed the reversal and upheld the original decision. The news of this final judgment must have been a great relief to many country squires, like Sir Richard, who were faced with the loss of their deposits if the Lord Chancellor's reversal held good.¹ The hope that the seizure of the lands of the Irish Jacobites, ^{1699/} which Sedley had pressed in the House of Commons, ^{1 1700} would enable the land tax to be reduced, would be heartily shared by a large landowner like Sir Richard. Sedley does not mention that he spoke in favour of a larger military establishment in the House;² Sir Richard Newdigate would hardly sympathise with a policy that would mean a higher land tax. The following letter from Sir Charles Sedley to Sir Richard Newdigate is the latest extant example of his correspondence. It is only headed "January 2d," but from the contents it is clear that the year is 1700/01. The question of ^{1700/} the Spanish Succession, which had been troubling the ¹⁷⁰¹ minds of European statesmen for years, had come to a head with the death of Charles II of Spain in November 1700. The Duke of Anjou to whom Sedley refers is the grandson of Louis XIV, who was proclaimed King of Spain by the French on the death of Charles II. William III had long sought to prevent such a consummation, which he perceived would turn the whole vast Spanish empire into an appanage of the French monarchy. The French King, thinking that the English Parliament was far too engaged in party quarrels to come to their rescue, "began with the Dutch," by seizing the "Barrier Towns" of Spanish Flanders which Holland had been allowed to garrison as a safeguard against French aggression. The embassy from the Emperor which is mentioned was an attempt to gain English support for the German candidate for the Spanish throne, the Archduke Charles of Austria.

¹ See the Life of Lord Somers in Campbell's "Lives of the Lord Chancellors" (4th ed., 1857), V. 99-101; also Luttrell's "Brief Relation," IV. 606.

"January 2d

S^r

If your last was writ under a great weight of busnes, mine is not less for the election at Romny is now in agitation soe that I am always reading or writing letters about it. beeing of

¹ See p. 185.

² See p. 199.

1700/
1701

Caesar mind, as exprest by Lucan, Nill actum reputans dum quid Superesset Agendum. Our news is soe uncertane that I dare write litle for truth—wee are already divided into factions about war or peace: we have had noe advice from the Duke of Anjou of his accession to the Crowne of Spain soe that we are not prest for an imediate declaration either way. The King of France has begun with the Dutch to whom hee has given a month time before hee expects Their resolution: the Emperor has sent as An Embass. who offers no great matters if wee enter into his quarrel tis a difficult conjuncture, wee hope for some light in it from thee free debates of parlament. I wish wee had you amongst us the Nation might bee as much beholding to your Ability there, as your owne family is like to bee to your Industry where you are: the King keeps his Christmas at Hampton court where hee is out of the reach of all whose places doe not afford them Six horses to follow him with My Sonn is not yet recoverd of his gout: your clauter and the little one are in good health wee all present our most humble service to your selfe and the rest of your family I am going to dine with the french Ambassador who goes away in a few weekes and will be succeeded by a man of greater quality

Yours

CH. SEDLEY."

The complaint that William III kept his Court at a distance from the town is natural enough from one who could remember the glories of Whitehall under the easy-going rule of Charles II. The French Ambassador with whom Sedley was going to dine was Poussin, who was well known for his intrigues with members of the English Parliament. Some months later the Tory party incurred great unpopularity ^{1700/} because some of their members were found dining ¹⁷⁰¹ with him at a Jacobite tavern.¹ It is to be feared that the passage referring to him in this letter points to the probability that Sedley may have received the bounty of Louis XIV in exchange for his vote in the Commons. Even if the member for New Romney was perfectly innocent of such dealings with the agent of a foreign Power, he was certainly unwise to advertise his intimacy with the French envoy.

The spirit of the Baronet's youth was not altogether ¹⁷⁰⁰ extinguished by business and politics. It seems to have flared up for the last time in 1700, when Sir Richard Blackmore, the physician poet, author of various epic poems, and the Quack Maurus of Dryden's satire, flung down a challenge to the survivors of the outspoken age of Charles II, by publishing "A Satyr against Wit."² In this somewhat rambling effusion the physician attacks wit in general as the cause of the decline of English courage, virtue and learning. Somewhat inconsistently, he proposes the setting up of a Bank of Wit in order that true wit may be encouraged to circulate, and that the false article may be suppressed. The wit of Dorset, Blackmore's patron, and of his friends, is excluded from the general condemnation. Sedley's name is not mentioned. A little group of the maligned Wits answered this attack in a collection of epigrams called "Commendatory Verses on the Author of the Satyr of the Two Arthurs and the Satyr against Wit."³ The contributors included Sir Charles Sedley, Captain Richard Steele, the third Earl of Anglesey (who had married Lady Katherine Darnley, daughter of the Countess of Dorchester by James II), and others.

¹ Macaulay, "History of England," ed. Firth, VI. 2992.

² "A Satyr against Wit," fol. 1700.

³ "Commendatory Verses," etc., fol. 1700, p. 2.

1700 Sedley's contribution is an amusing little lampoon ending with the telling couplet,

"Thy Satyr's harmless: 'tis thy Prose that kills,
When thou prescrib'st thy Potions and thy Pills."

Blackmore was defended by some of his admirers in a further volume of "Discommendatory Verses on those which are truly Commendatory on the Author of the two Arthurs and the Satyrs against Wit."¹ One of the authors of this production breaks a lance with Sir Charles in an epigram which incorrectly calls him a knight and suggests that he was so diseased that

"both of Rhimes and Physick H'had his fill,
And swallow'd more than ev'ry Verse a Pill."

Sir Charles's pen seems to have been as active at the opening of the eighteenth century as at any time in his life. Besides composing a long poem on Matrimony (a subject which would have surprised his old playmates at the Court of Charles II), and perhaps translating a lively French farce,² he contributed several pieces to a miscellany published by Charles Gildon in 1701, among which was an exquisite version of an Ode of Horace, thus showing that his appreciation of the Latin poets remained as fresh as in his youth. It is improbable that he would have lived long into the eighteenth century under the most favourable conditions. Seventy was an age attained by few men in that intemperate and insanitary period. His life was, however, almost certainly shortened by 1701 a terrible blow which fell on him at the end of May 1701, when his only son, Sir Charles Sedley, knight, died at the age of about twenty-nine. The younger Sir Charles probably died in Bloomsbury Square, for he was buried at St. Giles-in-the-Fields on 29 May.³ His father did not survive him long.

¹ "Discommendatory Verses," etc., fol. 1700, p. 3.

² See p. 280.

³ St. Giles-in-the-Fields Burial Register.

He fell seriously ill, and was attended by two ¹⁷⁰¹ of the most distinguished physicians of the day, Sir Hans Sloane and Dr. Edmund King. From some letters which passed between the two doctors,¹ it seems that Sedley had somewhat recovered by 3 August, and by the advice of Sir Hans resolved to seek a change of air. For this purpose he took a cottage at Hampstead,² a thatched building on the gentle well-wooded slope between London and the village of Hampstead. After three weeks in this pleasant place, where the ringing of distant church bells must have come faintly through the windows, mingled with the humming of bees and the lowing of cattle, Sir Charles Sedley died towards the end of August 1701. Ann Ayscough, Frances, Lady

¹ Brit. Mus., Sloane MSS. 4708, ff. 92, 96.

² This cottage afterwards belonged to Sir Richard Steele. He wrote to Pope on 1 June, 1712:—

"I am at a solitude, a house between Hampstead and London, wherein Sir Charles Sedley died. This circumstance set me a thinking and ruminating upon the employments in which men of wit exercise themselves. It was said of Sir Charles, who breathed his last in this room,

Sedley has that prevailing gentle art,
Which can with a resistless charm impart
The loosest wishes to the chastest heart;
Raise such a tumult, kindle such a fire
Between declining virtue and desire,
Till the poor vanquished maid dissolves away
In dreams all night, in sighs and tears all day.

This was a happy talent to a man of the town; but I dare say, without presuming to make uncharitable conjectures on the author's present condition, he would rather have had it said of him that he had prayed

O thou my lips inspire,
Who touched Isaiah's hallowed lips with fire!"

("Works of Pope," ed. Elwin and Courthope, VI. 396.) According to Howitt ("Northern Heights of London," p. 214) this cottage was pulled down in 1867. There are engravings of it in Howitt's book and in Parke's, "Topography and Natural History of Hampstead."

1701 Sedley and her children were, doubtless, by his bedside, and with them was a certain young Harry Davenant, grandson of old Sir William, the dramatist. Perhaps it amused Sir Charles to exchange with this young man reminiscences of his grandfather, whom he must have known well in his youth. Four years later, when Davenant was English envoy at Frankfurt, he told the young Duke of Shrewsbury that he was "with Sir Ch. Sedley in his last hours, and that he died like a philosopher without fear or superstition."¹ The poet was buried on 26 August in the family vault at Southfleet Church. His executors omitted, or were unable, to certify that he had been buried in wool according to the ancient statute for the encouragement of the wool trade, and were compelled to pay a fine of fifty shillings to the Poor of the Parish.² His will,³ proved on 30 August, confirmed all former settlements, and appointed Sir Charles Sedley, knight, Edward Bedingfield of Gray's Inn, and Stoughton Bird executors. As the younger Sir Charles was dead, Bedingfield and Bird must have acted alone on behalf of the legatees. Five pounds apiece for mourning were left to Sir Charles's servants, and the will contained directions that the house in Bloomsbury Square was to be kept together "for one callander month," the executors to defray "all the charge of such house keeping."

1707-08 Ann Ayscough lived on until the end of February or beginning of March 1707/8. She was buried on 2 March at Southfleet Church, where the tactful scribe of the register describes her as "Ann ye Relict of Sir Charles Sedley of ye Parish of St. Giles in ye

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., Report on the MSS. of the Duke of Buccleuch, II. 793 (Journal of His Grace, Charles, Duke of Shrewsbury, 1 November, 1700, 7 January, 1706, s.d. 1 October, 1705).

² Photograph of entry in Southfleet Burial Register in the possession of Mr. G. Thorn Drury.

³ See full text of will in Appendix I.

fields in ye County of Middlesex Barrrt.”¹ Her 1707-08 daughter-in-law, Frances, Lady Sedley, seems to have shone for a few seasons at Bath, to judge from a MS. epigram by W. Taylor written about 1702, “On Mr Jervois refusing Lady Sidley a breakfast at Bath,” where the poet conjectures that if Adam had been as insensible to beauty as Mr. Jervois,

“He by Stupidity had saved his race.”²

“Frank” left the world of hoops, powdered hair, and compliments in heroic couplets in 1711.³

Her eldest child, Charles, was created a baronet 1702-78 by Queen Anne on 1 July, 1702, with the style of Sir Charles Sedley of Oxton, in Nottinghamshire, where he seems to have inherited, or purchased, an estate. He married an heiress of that county, Elizabeth Frith of Nuthall, and died on 18 February, 1729/30. He appears to have been a prudent young man, for he put the estate in order by obtaining in July 1721 permission from the Court of Chancery to sell part of the lands in order to pay off the encumbrances with which they were still burdened. By this means he paid off the mortgage of £4120 raised by Sir Charles Sedley, the poet, in 1675.⁴ The son of this Sir Charles Sedley of Oxton and his wife Elizabeth was also called Charles, and inherited the baronetcy.⁵ This Sir Charles, the second baronet of the new creation, resided at Nuthall Temple, and is said to have been a jovial person, somewhat resembling his great-grandfather. He sat in three Parliaments and was present at the opening of the Radcliffe Camera at Oxford, in 1789, when he received the honorary degree of D.C.L. He died, unmarried, on 23 August,

¹ Southfield Burial Register.

² Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 37,684, p. 4.

³ Southfleet Burial Register.

⁴ Haslewood's notes to Jacob, Nos. 4 and 10: see Appendix I.

⁵ He also had a daughter named Elizabeth who married Sir R. Burdett, and was mother of Sir F. Burdett, the well-known politician.

1702-78 1778, leaving an illegitimate daughter, Elizabeth Rebecca Ann Sedley, the wife of Henry Vernon, who ultimately succeeded to the title of Baron Vernon on the death of his elder brother. She was the ancestress in direct line of the present Baron Vernon of Kinderton.

The Countess of Dorchester, a survival of the wicked and witty days of the Stuarts, lived on well into the eighteenth century. Like her father, she seems to have been a patient of the great Sir Hans Sloane. A couple of short notes to the great physician in her handwriting survive among the Sloane Papers,¹ and show that she was rather intimate with Sir Hans. He was not her only favourite in the medical profession. She is recorded by the fourth Earl of Chesterfield to have paid a great compliment to another great doctor by comparing his skill to her wit, saying "that she and Dr. Radcliffe together could cure a fever."² 1703-11 On 30 October, 1703, the Commons of Ireland voted to Lady Dorchester the pension of £5000 granted to her by James II,³ and thus, no doubt, enabled her to maintain her family in the splendour that was so dear to her heart.

In 1711, Lord Portmore seems to have been serving in Portugal, and a Mr. Conduitt, Master of the Mint, who married Sir Isaac Newton's niece, Catherine Barton, wrote a copy of verses to console the Countess in the absence of her "Hero," who, "beside the Guadiana," Labours to animate the lazy war."

"with unweary'd care

The poet pictures Lady Dorchester seeking distraction in the care of her children :—

¹ See Appendix III, "Some Documents Illustrative of the Life of K. Sedley, Countess of Dorchester."

² Chesterfield's "Letters to His Son," ed. G. Strachey (Methuen, 1901), I. 300.

³ Luttrell's "Brief Relation," V. 353.

"There you watch o'er your darling's tender years
 With painful pleasures and incessant cares,
 Beguil'd awhile your absent lord enjoy
 In the dear image of the smiling boy,
 Cornelia-like direct their infant feet,
 And show them to be good and teach them to be great—" ¹
1703-11

Besides "directing the infant feet" of her children, she appears to have kept a sharp watch over her financial and political interests. In April 1711,² a Bill was carried in the House of Commons to appoint Commissioners "to examine the value of all lands and other interests granted by the Crown since the 13th February, 1688/9, and upon what considerations such grants were made, in order to resume the same and apply them to the use of the public." An extant letter of the Countess shows that she had well-grounded fears that her grants of land and her pension, which had been confirmed by William III, would be resumed. The letter is addressed to somebody with considerable political power, and perhaps was one of the factors which helped to secure the rejection of the Resumptions Bill by the House of Lords on 24 April.³ From this letter we learn that the Countess had been wise enough to transfer her pension to her husband, and could therefore plead a patriotic motive for desiring to retain it.⁴

Katherine kept her wit till the end. She was present ¹⁷¹¹⁻¹⁴ at George I's coronation, and when the Archbishop went round the throne demanding the consent of the people, she remarked to Lady Cowper, who was standing by her, "Does the old Fool think that Anybody here will say no to his Question, when there are so many drawn Swords?"⁵ She attended George I's

¹ MS. in the possession of Mr. G. Thorn Drury.

² Cobbett's "Parl. Hist.," VI. 1005.

³ Ibid., VI. 1013, 1014.

⁴ See the text of this letter in Appendix II, pp. 350-52.

⁵ Lady Cowper's Diary (John Murray), 1864, p. 5.

1711-14 Drawing Rooms, and, meeting at one of these assemblies her old friend, Louise de K  roualle, Duchess of Portsmouth, and Elizabeth Villiers, Countess Orkney, William III's mistress, she is said to have exclaimed, "Who would have thought that we three W . . . s should have met here."¹

1717-43 In the autumn of 1717 the old Countess, still, doubtless, bedizened with finery, was seen tottering feebly through the gay crowds at Bath. She was taken seriously ill in that city and died on 26 October.² The Countess of Dorchester was, in her way, as notable a person as her father. After two centuries her frailties can be condoned as the inevitable results of her education and environment. Her wit and her courage should keep her memory green. Lord Dartmouth said that "Her wit was rather surprizing than pleasing, for there was no restraint in what she said of or to any body."³ To us it seems rather like a clean gust of truth blowing through the dusty hypocrisies of the old Court life.

1743 Her daughter by James II (or Colonel Grahame), Lady Katherine Darnley, married James Annesley, third Earl of Anglesey, on 7 November, 1699.⁴ After having been shamefully maltreated by that nobleman, she obtained a divorce,⁵ and on 7 February, 1703/4, became the second wife of John Sheffield, formerly Earl of Mulgrave, now Duke of Buckinghamshire.⁶ Like her husband, she was famous for her almost religious worship of her own rank and

¹ Quoted in G. E. C. Peerage, s.a. Dorchester, Countess of, IV. 406 n.

² Hist. MSS. Comm., Polwarth MSS. (I. 358, Robethon to Polwarth, 27 September, 1717). See also Jesse's "Memoirs of the Court of England."

³ Note to Burnet's "History of his Own Times" (ed. Oxford, 1833), II. 120 note o.

⁴ Luttrell's "Brief Relation," IV. 578.

⁵ Hist. MSS. Comm., House of Lords MSS., Vol. IV (N.S.) passim.

⁶ D. N. B., s.a. Sheffield, John, Duke of Buckinghamshire.

titles. "Princess Buckingham," as she was called, 1743 refused to believe her mother's outspoken assurance that she was Colonel Grahame's daughter, and clung to the idea that she was of royal descent. She lived in Buckingham House on the site of the present Buckingham Palace, and, on the anniversary of the execution of Charles I, she used to receive her guests there, sitting in a chair of state, surrounded by her ladies, and dressed in deep mourning.¹ She died on 13 March, 1743. On her death-bed she is said to have sent for "a Clergyman of whom she had heard a very good Character, in order to be satisfied as to some Doubts. The first Question she asked was, Whether in Heaven (for she made no doubt of going thither) some Respect would not be had to a Woman of such Birth and Breeding? The good Man, for such he really was, endeavoured to show her the Weakness of this Notion, and to convince her that there was where she was going no Acceptance of Persons, and much more to the same Purpose. This the poor Lady heard with much attention, and then said with a Sigh, 'Well! if it be so, this Heaven is after all a strange Place.'"² If this story is true, it shows that the Duchess inherited her mother's pride without her wit. She had a funeral which would have thoroughly satisfied her exalted opinion of herself. Her "Effigy in Wax" was dressed in her coronation robes, and drawn in a car under a canopy of state by six horses covered with black velvet. Four dukes were pall bearers, and all "the Prime Nobility" drove in the procession in coaches and six.³

The Countess of Dorchester's eldest legitimate son, Charles Colyear, inherited his father's title and estate. By him something of the intellectual energy of the Sedleys was transmitted to two distinguished

¹ Allan Fea's "James II and his Wives" (London, Methuen, 1908). Mr. Fea quotes no authority for this story.

² The Champion, 7 April, 1743.

³ Ibid.

1743 families. His illegitimate daughter, Elizabeth Collier,¹ was the wife of Erasmus Darwin, the poet and scientist, and grandmother of Sir Francis Galton, the founder of the science of eugenics. His legitimate daughter and heir, Caroline, married Sir Nicholas Curzon of Kedleston, from whom the late Marquess Curzon of Kedleston was descended.

Sir Charles Sedley has, hitherto, been judged from memoirs which consisted of little more than a few anecdotes concerning the frolics of his youth. The recording and piecing together of a number of forgotten facts enables us, without whitewashing these peccadilloes, to take a more favourable view of a life which was far from wholly bad or useless. To the present writer the importance of that life seems to lie, not in the dissipation of the Restoration Court, but in the period that followed the "conversion" of 1679/80. The significance of that "conversion" was not merely the successful reconstitution of a life that was drifting to ruin, but the fact that the Baronet, while becoming a respectable member of society, succeeded in retaining something of his old gaiety and intellectual freedom. In 1687 he could still write and publish "Bellamira," and later, when Blackmore attacked Wit, could chastise the physician, not with "Black Will and a Cudgel," but with the more civilised weapon of ridicule. The seventeenth century was a witches' cauldron, boiling up with alternate hell-broths of black Puritanism and aristocratic licence and corruption. English civilisation in its fullest sense could only result from a combination of the probity and decency of the Puritan, separated from his dourness and philistinism, with the culture and gaiety of the Cavalier, divorced from his licence and brutality.

¹ For a portrait of this lady see Prof. Karl Pearson's "Life and Letters of Galton," Vol. I. Elizabeth Collier was Erasmus Darwin's second wife. She was not the grandmother of Charles Darwin, who was descended from Erasmus Darwin's first wife.

Sedley belonged to the wealthy and educated class¹⁷⁴³ which was chiefly responsible for the future. The task before them (to be accomplished finally in the eighteenth century) was no less than the civilising and humanising of their order. If the debauch at the Cock and the caning of Kynaſton were reversions to the barbarism of a former age, it may, on the other hand, be claimed that a real contribution to the cause of English civilisation was made by a wealthy baronet, who devoted a large part of his time to the acquirement of a really wide and liberal culture, who could break through the barriers of rank and prejudice sufficiently to treat professional men of letters like Dryden and Shadwell as friends and comrades, and, finally, who could remain faithful for nineteen years to a woman to whom he was bound by no strictly legal tie, and treat her son with "an entire, free and easie friendship" in place of the old paternal tyranny.

PART II

THE WORKS OF SIR CHARLES SEDLEY

CHAPTER I

THE PLAYS

"While Fathers are severe, and Servants cheat,
Till Bawds and Whores can live without deceit, Sydley, and easy Etheridge shall be great."

John Evelyn the Younger (in "Poems by Several Hands" . . . Collected by N.
Tate, 8vo London, 1685, p. 92).

"She¹ strait pull'd off her Sattin cap, and Band:
Bade Wycherly be bold in her Defence,
With pointed Wit, and Energy of Sense:
Etherege and Sidley join'd him in her Cause,
And all deserved, and all received Applause."

E. Fenton, "Poems on Several Occasions," 8vo, 1717, p. 72; "An Epistle to Mr. Southerne."

SOME twenty years ago a critic remarked that "Sedley wrote several plays, and it is enough to say of them that they were plays suited to the tastes of the Court of Charles II."² This sentence is really characteristic of an earlier age which believed the legend (partly invented by Macaulay) that Etherege, Wycherley and the other writers of the comedy of manners in the latter half of the seventeenth century were nothing but a gang of foul-mouthed debauchees who deliberately turned the English drama into an Augean stable that could only be cleansed by the fire of a Jeremy Collier. It is true that Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh and Farquhar were always to some extent excepted from the general condemnation, partly because they had been defended by such able critics as Lamb, Hazlitt and Leigh Hunt, and partly because they were all more or less competently re-edited during the nineteenth century. By the beginning of the present century Sir George Etherege had reached a similar position through the agency of Sir Edmund Gosse's charming essay, Verity's edition and John Palmer's brilliant study. Attention had also been drawn to the merits of Shadwell's comedies by Saintsbury and Churton Collins. Sedley has not hitherto been so fortunate. The sentence quoted at the beginning of this chapter still sums up what is known of Sedley's plays even by students who have a really wide knowledge of English literature. There are probably two reasons for this neglect of Sedley's dramas. The first is the very practical one that they have not been re-edited since 1778, and therefore have been unobtainable by most students of drama, and the other that he was unfortunate enough to leave four authentic plays, of which one was a passable and a second an excellent comedy, the third an inferior tragedy, and the fourth an unfinished remodelling of the same piece.¹ As the last two pieces challenge a most unfortunate comparison with works of Shakespeare and Dryden on the same subject, it is hardly surprising that attention has been drawn to them, and that Sedley's abilities as a dramatist as far as they have been remembered at all have been judged by these unlucky works. Contemporary writers, however, ranked him beside Sir George Etherege as no mean dramatist and as one of the originators of that brilliant kind of comedy which reached its culminating point in the plays of Congreve. Professor Allardyce Nicoll in his recent book on Restoration Drama has expressed the same view in some admirable sentences,¹ and it is the object of the present detailed study to show that considered on their own merits, and apart from the disastrous experiment in tragedy, his comedies alone entitle him to a place beside Etherege and well deserve to be studied both for their intrinsic merits and as interesting and important documents in literary and social history.

¹ i.e. Comedy.

² Thomas Longueville in "Rochester and Other Literary Rakes of the Court of Charles II" (Longmans, Green, London), 1902, p. 78.

¹ Viz. "The Mulberry Garden," "Bellamira," "Antony and Cleopatra," and "Beauty the Conquerour." As "The Grumbler" was not printed till many years after the author's death, its authenticity cannot be definitely accepted.

"The Mulberry Garden," Sedley's first original play, produced at the King's house, Drury Lane, on 18 May, 1668, was, according to Pepys, "long expected," and the same author informs us that "all the world" did "expect great matters" from so reputed a wit.² Already on 11 January, 1667/8, Mrs. Knipp had told Pepys of a play shortly coming on the stage, which she thinks will be called "The Wandering Ladys, a comedy which she thinks will be most pleasant."³ There can be no doubt that "The Wandering Ladys" was merely an earlier title for "The Mulberry Garden," and one which would have been perfectly justified by the conduct of the two madcaps, Victoria and Olivia, in the play as we know it. The long-expected comedy seems to have been something of an anti-climax, at any rate in the opinion of the critics, though it was certainly liked by the theatre-going public of the day. Pepys, it will be remembered, was very disappointed, although he admits that he was prejudiced by the badness of the music: "the play when it come, though there was here and there a pretty saying and not very much neither, yet the whole play had nothing extraordinary in it at all, neither of language nor design." Charles II, if we may believe

¹ Allardyce Nicoll, "Restoration Drama" (Cambridge Univ. Press, 1923), pp. 222, 223.

² Pepys, Diary, ed. Wheatley, VIII. 19.

³ Ibid., VII. 277 n.

Pepys, was equally disappointed. The diarist did not "see him laugh or pleased from beginning to end, nor the company; inasmuch as I have never been so disappointed with a new play in my life I think."¹ Perhaps this was true of the King, but it is very doubtful whether it was true of "the Company," whose countenances it may be supposed Pepys saw through jaundiced eyes. On the contrary, there can be little doubt that it was a great theatrical success. This is proved by the fact that it was acted again on 20 May and 29 June, on both of which dates Pepys saw it again, and was probably revived in 1675 and 1688.² The quarto edition published in the year of the former revival seems to have had a very wide sale. It is by far the commonest quarto edition of any of Sedley's plays. Other writers besides Pepys testify to the bad reception of the play by a section of the public. Oldham in "A Satyr" (Works, 8vo, 1703, p. 422) probably referred to this when he wrote:

*"Sidley indeed may be content with Fame,
Nor care should an ill judging Audience damn":*

while Sir George Etherege, Sedley's intimate friend, writing as follows from Ratisbon on 23 May, 1687, about Sir Charles's second comedy, "Bellamira," clearly refers to the bad reception of "The Mulberry Garden" by certain critics:—"Some barren sparks have found fault with what he has formerly done on this occasion onely because the fatness of the soile has produc'd to [sic] big a Crop."³ Finally, Sedley himself wrote in the Prologue to "Bellamira" (4to, 1687):

*"Our Author try'd his own and cou'd not bit,
He now presents you with some Forraign Wit."*

¹ Pepys Diary, ed. Wheatley, VIII. 20.

² Quarto editions were published in both these years: this was usually done when a play was revived.

³ Ratisbon Letter Book, f. 94 (to Mr. Will. Richards ^{23 May}/_{2 June}, 1687).

It is true that Shadwell, one of the most competent dramatists of the day, praised "The Mulberry Garden," but he was hardly disinterested,

It is clear from these passages that contemporary criticism was not altogether favourable to "The Mulberry Garden." The stage success of the play must therefore have been due chiefly to Sedley's popularity at Court and to his reputation as man of wit and fashion. More recent critics have generally taken the same view as Pepys, Charles II and Etherege's "barren sparks." Sir A. W. Ward goes so far as to pronounce it "worthless."¹ If the play is regarded purely from an artistic standpoint, there is some reason for the condemnation of the critics, although Sir A. W. Ward's "worthless" is a great deal too strong. Judged solely as a play, "The Mulberry Garden" fails in spite of some sprightly scenes, because of its shapelessness and incoherence. It is exactly the kind of comedy that one would expect from a gifted but inexperienced amateur. Apart from one capital fault that will be considered hereafter, its structure is loose and rambling beyond even the very lax limits of the typical Restoration comedy. The first hint for the plot seems to have been taken from Molière's "L'École des Maris," but it is far from true to say that Sedley's play is in any sense a translation of the French comedy. It is interesting, however, to compare the treatment of the same theme by the French and the English author. Such a comparison brings out the structural defects of "The Mulberry Garden" very clearly.

"L'École des Maris," produced at the Théâtre du Palais Royal on 24 June, 1661, itself owes a little to the Adelphi of Terence. The opening scene, as in Sedley's play, introduces two elderly brothers who differ in their views on the treatment of young women.

as it is probable that he received substantial favours from Sir Charles. Moreover, his praise is given in quite general terms: "you have in the Mulberry-Garden shown the true Wit, Humour, and Satyr of a Comedy." Dedication of "A True Widow."

¹ "History of English Dramatic Literature," III. 448.

They are able to test their theories in practice, as they are guardians of two sisters, who have been entrusted by their deceased father to their respective cares. Sganarelle, adopting the oriental and despotic method, keeps a tight hand over Isabelle, who, schooled by adversity, learns to deceive him so artfully that he is actually lured against his will and without his knowledge to aid and abet the young gallant, Valère, to win her heart and hand. Ariste, the elder brother, allows to his ward, Léonor, the utmost freedom, and treats her as an equal, with the result that she falls in love with him and makes him an excellent wife. The play is an exquisitely proportioned little fable in defence of the treatment of women as rational beings, and is summed up in the famous line:

“Je trouve que le cœur est ce qu’il faut gagner.”

Molière never strays for an instant beyond what is necessary for his purpose, which is beautifully accomplished in three acts.

To turn from “L’Ecole des Maris” to “The Mulberry Garden” is like turning from the flower-beds of Versailles to the wilderness of some neglected English country garden. Sedley starts from practically the same point as Molière, except that his two brothers disagree concerning the treatment, not of their wards, but of their daughters. But the English author complicates matters at the outset by giving his Sir Samuel Forecast and Sir John Everyyoung two daughters apiece, and brings in a fresh cause for disagreement between them by laying the scene in the England of the Commonwealth and making Forecast a sober Puritan and Everyyoung a jolly Cavalier. The original motif of the contrast between the results of the severity of Forecast and the easy-going treatment of Everyyoung is soon forgotten in a tangle of intrigue which gives Victoria and Olivia, Everyyoung’s two daughters, two vain young coxcombs, Modish and Estridge, as suitors, while their friend Jack Wildish, a younger son but a man of wit and fashion, aspires to the hand of Olivia. A new interest arises from the rivalry between Wildish and Estridge and Modish, resulting in his final success in showing them in their true colours to the ladies. An entirely separate plot is concerned with the separation of Althea and Diana, Forecast's daughters, from their Cavalier lovers, Eugenio and Philander, and the attempts of their father to make Althea marry Horatio, a gentleman of the Roundhead party, who has already been a suitor to Victoria. Humorous by-play is provided by a plan of Wildish's to score off Sir Samuel by persuading him to court a rich "widow." He alleges that this lady is his relative, but she is actually the widow's house-keeper, whom he persuades to impersonate her. The romantic adventures of Eugenio, Philander, Althea and Diana give an opportunity for Diana to adopt the time-honoured device of English comedy and visit her lover in male attire. Finally, the Restoration is used as a convenient deus ex machinâ to untie the whole tangle, bring about a general reconciliation, and marry all the lovers to their mistresses except the unfortunate Estridge and Modish, the latter of whom is appropriately bestowed on the mock "widow."

It seems almost as if Sedley had resolved to drag in by hook or crook every stock situation of contemporary comedy that he could think of. Etherege probably referred euphemistically to this overloading of the plot when he remarked that "the fatness of the soile produc'd to big a Crop." The fault lies less in the complexity, which is indeed unravelled with no little ingenuity, than in the fact that there is no single dominant interest. Sedley might well have protested against a comparison between his play and Molière's on the ground that the aims of the English comedy of manners and its French counterpart were entirely different. Molière's aim was primarily to express a moral truth and incidentally to paint human nature. The aim of the English author, like that of his friend Etherege, was to give a gay and witty picture of the fashionable society of his day. But this is no excuse for sinning against the only dramatic "unity" that is essential to a good play, the unity of interest. Are we most concerned with the contrast between Forecast and Everyoung, the relations between Olivia, Victoria, Wildish, Estridge and Modish, or the romantic adventures of Eugenio, Philander, Althea and Diana? Even this fault might pass, and indeed does pass in certain Restoration plays, if there were a certain uniformity of style and matter. Here indeed is the capital defect of the play already mentioned. It is apparent from the very names of the characters. Harry Modish, Ned Estridge, Jack Wildish, Sir John Everyoung, his brother and his daughters might have been met any fine day between the Strand and St. James's Park, but from what fairy-land of rococo romance have Horatio, Eugenio, Philander, Diana and Althea descended? The manner and matter of their speeches are as unreal as their names. The realistic characters speak in conversational prose, the "heroic" characters in rimed couplets. It is true that Sir George Etherege in his first play, "The Comical Revenge, or Love in a Tub," had used the same incongruous mixture, but parody of the "heroic" tragedy of Orrery and Dryden was at least hinted in the title of that piece, while Sir George had since seen the error of his ways, and in his second comedy, "She Wou'd if She Cou'd," produced only four months before "The Mulberry Garden," had entirely abandoned the "heroic" element. In Sedley's first play the incongruity, not only of ideas, but of language, is especially striking. Half the characters live in the world of Pepys and the Memoirs of De Grammont, and the other half in that of Dryden's "Almanzor" and Settle's "Cambyzes." Jack Wildish speaks of love as Etherege or Rochester might have spoken of it. . . .

 "I never let the Disease run on so far, I always took it in time, and then a Bottle of Wine or two, and a She Friend is an approv'd remedy."

But Horatio addresses Althea like nobody outside the pages of "heroic romance" or "heroic tragedy":

"You shou'd with pity, not displeasure, see
 The change that your own self creates in me.
 The Roman Senate had their greatness worn
 Perhaps till now, had Cæsar not been born.
Darius' self cou'd not his Persians blame
 Because that Alexander overcame.
 In Love like War some Victor still there grows Whose spreading Empire nothing can oppose."

In the very spirit of Almanzor or Maximin, Horatio, when he has his rival at his mercy, refuses to take advantage of his position and fights on Eugenio's side against the Roundhead soldiers who have come to arrest him. We rub our eyes and wonder if we are indeed in the neighbourhood of St. James's Park, where Sir Samuel Forecast was cudgelled by the orders of Sir John Everyoung, and Kynaston, the actor, suffered at the hands of the emissaries of Sir Charles Sedley.

Having acknowledged that "The Mulberry Garden" fails as a whole, we can give due praise to individual passages. The intrinsic value of the play lies entirely in the comic and realistic scenes. The romantic passages show no merit except a facile command of the heroic couplet. Much of the verse is in exactly the strain of Sedley's own complimentary lyrics, and he has indeed on two occasions used almost the same lines for both purposes.¹ This hyperbolical vein of romantic compliment may be pleasing enough in a short "paper of verses" of ten or twenty lines, but it is wearisome stuff when it is bandied from one speaker to another throughout an entire scene. At its

¹ Mulberry Garden, II. i.:

"But, fair Althea, you were much to blame
 With your own breath to blow a hopeless flame."

lowest the heroic verse with its jejune and conventional rhythm and vocabulary sinks to mere fustian:

"Can this Eugenio be and so unkind?
What strange distemper rages in thy mind?
Cou'd once my Soul of a base thought^{*} allow,
He that believes me false shou'd find me so."

It is a relief to escape out of this monstrous world of literary convention and listen to the graceful, easy dialogue of the realistic scenes. At their best these scenes have a lightness and distinction unequalled by any contemporary dramatist except Etherege. Sedley's prose, always lucid and well-bred, occasionally flowers into a really beautiful cadence, such as that which is heard in Olivia's comparison of the Mulberry Garden to the "long Walk at home":

"for in my opinion half a score young men, and Fine Ladies well drest, are a greater Ornament to a Garden than a Wilderness of Sycamores, Orange and Lemmon Trees; and the rustling of rich Vests and Silk Pettycoats, better Musick than the purling of Streams, Chirping of Birds, or any of our Country Entertainments."

When Pepys wrote of "here and there a pretty saying," he was probably thinking of the wit of Jack Wildish,

These lines are practically repeated in "A Platonick" (first printed in Kemp's Collection, 1672):

"Fair Octavia, you are most to blame
To blow the fire and wonder at the flame."

Mulberry Garden, V. i.:

"Look on thyself and measure thence my love,
Think what a flame so bright a form must move:
That knot be confident will ever last,
Which Passion ty'd and Reason has made faste."

Cf. "Constancy" (Kemp's Collection, I. 46):

"Look on thy self, and measure thence my love,
Think what a passion such a form must move;

That knot (be confident) will ever last,
Which Fancy ty'd and Reason has made fast."

which is exactly of the gay unmoral kind that delighted the Court of Charles II. A few of his sentences have the dry sparkle that Congreve was to polish later to diamond-like brilliance. The best is perhaps his remark that “ . . . fine Women, like Great Tables, though they are maintain'd by men of Fortunes, are ever open to Men of Parts.”

And his playful defence of Sir Samuel's attitude to Althea is a pretty piece of mockery belied by his own suit to Olivia:

“ Now there, Sir Samuel, I am on your side. For so the Fan be played with, the hand kiſt; in fine the passion handsomly discharg'd, tis no great matter who does it.”

The heroic characters are the merest lay figures,¹ but Wildish, Estridge, Modish, the brothers Everyoung and Forecast, and Everyyoung's daughters, Victoria and Olivia, are drawn with a certain liveliness that deserves commendation. Forecast, the Puritan city knight, is of course a stock character of seventeenth-century comedy, but Sedley's sketch is by no means one of the worst of this favourite butt of the “quick comedians” of the day, and probably provided hints for Congreve's Foresight in “Love for Love.” It is lacking in the bitterness that Wycherley shows in his terrible picture of Alderman Gripe. Forecast is cudgelled, but he is allowed to make his peace on very easy terms at the end, and escapes the fate of marrying the sham "widow." There is a charming frugality in his reminiscence of the widow's defunct spouse: "We have drunk many a dish of coffee together." Sir John Everyoung is clearly meant to be a foil to his Puritan brother and to represent the ideal elderly man about town. His device of cudgelling Forecast makes him seem rather brutal to modern eyes, but such a proceeding would be a perfectly justifiable frolic in the judgment of a Restoration audience. For the rest, he is a merry old gentleman and his good-natured treatment of his daughters covers a multitude of sins.

¹ Mr. C. H. Wilkinson in his recent edition of the Poems of Lovelace, following a suggestion of Mr. Thorn Drury, points out that Eugenio is possibly intended to be portrait of Lovelace. Like Lovelace he is in love with an Althea, and certain phrases used by him bear a faint resemblance to some of Lovelace's most famous lines (see “The Poems of Richard Lovelace,” ed. C. H. Wilkinson, Oxford, 1925, I. lvii. and Editor's Preface to “The Mulberry Garden” in my edition of Sedley's Works).

The character of Jack Wildish can only be adequately studied in connection with the historical position of "The Mulberry Garden" in the evolution of the comedy of manners, and the same may be said of that of his mistress, Olivia. At this point it is only necessary to remark that the witty duet between them is both from an artistic and historical point of view the most important thing in the play.

Victoria, the deserted mistress of Horatio, lives, if only for her delicious reply to Wildish's request that she should witness his wedding with Olivia:

"Well, Mr. Wildish, I'll dance barefoot to serve you."

As for Estridge and Modish, they are convincing pictures of the fops who were the usual butts of Sedley and his friends, and are good empty rattles prefiguring the great Sir Fopling Flutter and "Turk Tattle." Wildish's ironical description of the manner in which they pass their time might come out of the Memoirs of De Grammont: "Besides, every good Man is not acquainted with this Principle among you, that you can be in love with nothing but yourselves, and may be jealous of his Wife, when indeed you come innocently to take a view of your persons from Head to feet in the great Glass; comb out your Periwig, shake your Garnitures and be gone." "What," answers Estridge, "dost think we have no other way of Entertainment? No Discourse, Jack?" "Yes, a little now and then," Wildish replies, "about their dress, whether their patches be too many or too few, too great or too small, whether her Handkerchief be Point de Venie or Rome; and having left behind you some proof of your ability in the Mode, return to show yourselves at the last Act of a Play." It is impossible not to feel rather sorry for them when Wildish deliberately lures them into talking indiscreetly within earshot of their mistresses, though their boasts are so outrageous that it cannot be denied that they deserved their disappointment in the affair of the "widow's" abduction.

The intrinsic merits of "The Mulberry Garden" may thus be summed up as a certain grace and distinction of style in its prose scenes and a genuine if immature talent in the drawing of certain characters. It receives a much greater interest than such merits could possibly give it from the very important position which it holds in the historical evolution of the comedy of manners.

The English comedy of manners may be defined as a comedy of wit and fashion representing the life of a small, brilliant, aristocratic society which prided itself on regarding all the problems of life from a purely intellectual and non-moral standpoint. It aims at being brilliant, heartless and anti-sentimental. The least breath of romance will immediately tarnish the glittering mirror of its wit. In the older English comedy the portrayal of "manners" was one element among many others. In Shakespeare it had been overshadowed by romance and in Jonson by "humour." The comedy of the earlier XVIIth century, chiefly inspired by Jonson, had been at once virile and fantastic, a comedy rather of humour (both in the old and the modern sense) than of wit, often tending to romance and not less frequently to the grotesque. The stock characters were the foolish young heirs with more money than sense, the riff-raff of tavern and fair who relieved them of their superfluous coin, the Puritans, justices, bawds and cast soldiers which Jonson delighted to portray. It was usually a painting of middle-class or low life in the Flemish style, rich in colour but not remarkable for lightness of touch or distinction of style.

Beaumont and Fletcher in such plays as "The Wild Goose Chase" had begun to experiment in something approaching the manner of Restoration comedy, and the lighter and more courtly note of their plays had been happily caught by some writers of the period immediately preceding the Civil War, such as Shirley, Brome and Nabbes. But even in "Hide Park," "The Witty Fair One," "The Sparagus Garden" and "The Bride," as in the comedies of Beaumont and Fletcher, romance and sentiment are part of the very weft of the plot, and these qualities can never be harmonised with the purely intellectual and non-moral spirit of the true comedy of manners.

The older type of Jonsonian comedy continued to be written after the Restoration by John Wilson and Sir Robert Howard, and was soon to be revived with great ability by Thomas Shadwell. But the spirit of the new age demanded a comedy which would express it better, a comedy which would give an appropriate form to the aspirations of the wits and fine ladies of Whitehall. To use a metaphor from another art, it demanded a painting less in the style of Teniers and more in that of Watteau or Fragonard. The new comedy must be all lightness of touch, all gaiety, ignoring both the moral pre-occupations of the Puritan and the grotesque whimsies of the old drama. Such an achievement was more difficult than the Restoration Wits supposed. Not until another generation, when they were all either dead or "converted," was the task fully accomplished by William Congreve, the artist who translated their strivings at last into a perfect form.

It was clear that the centre of the new kind of comedy must be the Man of Wit and Fashion as he was conceived by the courtiers of Charles II, the ideal personage who had been to some extent embodied in the persons of such men as Rochester, Etherege, Sedley and Buckhurst. The first and obvious method of making such a person an effective stage character was to contrast him with the false "pretenders to wit," the Chesterfields, Beau Hewitts and other foolish moths who circled giddily round the lights of Whitehall. He might also be appropriately contrasted with men of an older generation, who would puritanically condemn or clumsily share his pleasures. But such conflicts or contrasts between the obviously superior and obviously inferior persons (if we accept for critical purposes the standards of the Wits) are not the stuff out of which the central theme of great comedy can be evolved, although they may provide excellent diversion in sub-plots. The perfect comedy of manners, like all good forms of drama, demands a conflict between equals—in this case equals in wit and grace and style—for these are the qualities that are the chief concern of this kind of play, as intensity of imagination and heroic magnanimity are the chief concern of poetic tragedy. To place beside the ideal Wit an equally witty and graceful woman, who could meet him on his own ground and with his own weapons, could reply to his music with an equally enchanting strain of her own, and finally, without any trace of romance or sentiment, at once conquer him and yield to him—such was the goal towards which a whole school of dramatists was half consciously groping in the reign of Charles II. To disentangle these motifs from the old elements of Jonsonian humour and boisterous horseplay and from such new attractions as "heroic" poetry was the work of a whole generation. Sir George Etherege has rightly been given the leading place among the pioneers, but Dryden and Sedley both deserve to be ranged alongside him in this work. Already as early as 1664 Etherege had given the first sketch of the new type of fashionable hero in his Sir Frederick Frolick of "The Comical Revenge, or Love in a Tub." That play is marred both by the introduction of "heroic scenes" in verse and by a large element of horseplay of the old boisterous type. Etherege's second comedy, "She Wou'd if She Cou'd," produced in February 1667/8, marks a very great advance towards the pure comedy of manners. The heroic element is entirely absent and the whole play is in prose. Moreover, the two girls, Ariana and Gatty, have a grace and a gaiety far in advance of any female characters which the new type of comedy had hitherto produced. The weakness of the play is the comparative effacement of the two sparks, Courtal and Freeman, who ought to have responded on equal terms to Ariana and Gatty, by the two amusing old knights, Sir Oliver and Joslin.

Dryden, like Etherege, had been moving in the direction of the new form of comedy, and Loveby, the hero of his very first play, "The Wild Gallant" (1662/3), faintly foreshadows the new kind of hero. In the comic underplot of his romantic play, "The Maiden Queen" (March 1667/8), he had conceived a pair of lovers which play the amatory "Battle-Dore and Shuttlecock" of wit to perfection in certain scenes, and which are the closest approach to the new comic ideals of any characters that had hitherto appeared on the stage. Shadwell's remark on this pair is worth quoting as an acute description of the new comedy from the standpoint of one who was blindly prejudiced in favour of the old:

"but the two chief persons are most commonly a Swearing, Drinking, Whoring Ruffian for a Lover and an impudent, ill-bred Tomrig for a mistress, and these are the fine People of the Play; and there is that Latitude in this that almost anything is proper for them to say; but their chief Subject is Bawdy and Profaneness, which they call Brisk Writing. . . ."¹

"The Mulberry Garden" is thus seen to be slightly archaic in its retention of the "heroic" scenes and characters, and also in the boisterous incidents of the cudgelling of Forecast and the carrying off of the "widow." However, the characters of Wildish and Olivia mark a great advance towards the final form of the comedy of manners. Here are Dryden's witty lovers taken out of their romantic setting and placed in the appropriate environment of contemporary London. And although "The Mulberry Garden" has neither the sustained gaiety nor the skilfully managed plot of "She Wou'd if She Cou'd," these figures are something that Etherege had not yet succeeded in putting on the stage. Jack Wildish is less boisterous than Sir Frederick Frolick and wittier than Courtal and Freeman. His character is exactly of the type that was perhaps first born in the minds of the young men who haunted St. James's Park and the Mulberry Garden in the latter years of the Commonwealth, that new generation who, in Davenant's words, were "uningaged in the late differences"² and were as alien from the temper of the old Cavaliers as from that of the Puritans themselves. It is significant in this connection that Wildish has no political prejudices. He is on friendly terms with both Royalists and Republicans, and his attitude towards fighting is in striking contrast to that of the heroic Philander and Eugenio. It is summed up in his reply to Sir Samuel when the latter appeals to him for help against the soldiers:

"these are a Kind of Gamesters I dare not meddle with."

¹ Preface to "The Sullen Lovers" (produced May 1668. Works, 8vo, 1720, I.).

² See p. 40.

He is a realist and a man of pleasure, but he differs from the ill-bred sparks, Estridge and Modish, by his perfect manners. In this contrast lies the whole philosophy of the comedy of manners. Every gentleman is assumed to be a rake, but the elect are distinguished by wit and "good form," while the rest are damned, not for their deeds, but for their lack of style.

The character of Olivia is also an advance on the women that Etherege had hitherto created. Ariana and Gatty are delightful madcaps, but they are Olivia's inferiors both in wit and in self-possession. If Wildish is a foe to romantic sentiment, Olivia has an equal dislike for "whining Love" and "a whining copy of verses." Their final duel of wit before the lady surrenders is by far the best thing in the play, and is one of the first of many similar scenes which were to delight two generations. In Olivia's complaint:

"If I were your Wife, I must board half a year with a Friend in the Country, tumble about the other in most villainous Hackneys, lye two pair of Stairs high and wear Black Farrendine, the whole year about; see you when you had no money to play; and then be kist out of a Ring or a Bracelet. . . ."

and Wildish's rejoinder:

"If I make but love to a Chamber-maid, I shall be answer'd, you have a sweet Lady of your own, and why will you wrong her? If I get acquainted with any young woman, after the fourth or fifth visit, be looked upon by her Father and Mother Worse than the Tax Gatherers in a Country Village":

we can now find a pleasure unknown to the first readers of "The Mulberry Garden," for we are thrilled by the knowledge that we are hearing a prelude to that final duet of Mirabel and Millamant with which the comedy of manners was to reach a triumphant culmination.

The idea of naming a comedy after a public place of entertainment, where its action chiefly passes, was an old one and goes back at least to Jonson's "Bartholomew Fair." Before the Civil War there had been a "Covent Garden" and a "Totnam Court" by Nabbes, a "Hide Park" by Shirley and a "Sparagus Garden" by Brome. After Sedley's comedy, Wycherley's "Love in a Wood or St. James's Park" was to be staged in 1671 (though according to its author it was written much earlier), and an anonymous play called "The Mall, or The Modish Lovers," was acted and printed in 1674. The real Mulberry Garden was a famous pleasure ground which occupied part of the site of Buckingham Palace and its grounds. It derived its name from a garden of mulberry trees planted in 1609 by James I, who wished to encourage the manufacture of English silks. Charles I, in the fourth year of his reign, granted by letters patent to Lord Aston "the custody and keeping of the Mulberry Garden in the County of Middlesex, and of the mulberries and silkworms there, and of all the houses and buildings to the same garden belonging. . . ." Before 1632 Sir George Goring had purchased the post from Lord Aston and given his name to the residence. Not long after the house was occupied by Speaker Lenthall, while the garden under the Commonwealth became a place of public entertainment. At the Restoration Goring returned to his house. One of the other buildings became a tavern called Mulberry Garden House, and kept by a person named Coleby. The first mention of the Garden as a public resort is in Evelyn's Diary under the date of 10 May, 1654:

"My Lady Gerrard treated us at the Mulberry Garden, now the only place of refreshment about the town for persons of the best quality to be exceedingly cheated at; Cromwell and his partisans having shut up and seized on Spring Garden, which till now had been the usual rendezvous for the ladies and gallants at this season."¹

Ludlow in his Memoirs describes Charles II drinking healths "at a debauch in the Mulberry Garden."² Pepys, after seeing Sedley's comedy on 20 May, 1668, for the second time, "walked over the Park to the Mulberry Garden, where I never was before; and find it a very silly place, worse than Spring Garden and but little company, and those a rascally, whoring, roguing sort of people; only a wilderness here that is somewhat pretty, but rude. Did not stay to drink."³ Nevertheless three months later the diarist spent 18s. on Pierce and his wife there, and on 5 April, 1669, was again at the garden with "a good deal of company," and "we mighty merry."⁴

Dryden used to frequent the Mulberry Garden in his young days if we may trust the famous writer in the Gentleman's Magazine of February 1745, recalling the days of "plain John Dryden": "I have eat tarts with him and Madam Reeve at the Mulberry-Garden when our author advanced to a sword and chadreur wig." In 1709, Dr. King described the changes that had taken place in the neighbourhood in his "Art of Cookery":

"The fate of things is always in the dark;
What Cavalier would know St. James's Park?
For Locket's stands where gardens once did spring,
And wild ducks quack where grasshoppers did sing;
A princely palace on that site does rise,
Where Sedley's noble muse found Mulberries."

The "princely palace" was Buckingham House, erected by John Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave, and sub-

¹ Diary, ed. Dobson, II. 71.

² Ludlow's Memoirs, ed. Firth, II. 275.

³ Diary, ed. Wheatley, VIII. 23.

⁴ Ibid., VIII. 87, 285.

sequently Duke of Buckinghamshire, who in 1709 was living there with his haughty consort, Sir Charles Sedley's granddaughter. Probably the last record of the Mulberry Garden is in a Report to the Lords of the Treasury dated 25 February 1762, which describes it as "containing about four acres twenty-two perches, over which stands more than half of Buckingham House."

The Mulberry Garden figures in many contemporary plays as a public pleasure resort much frequented by lovers, young sparks and women of the town. Act II. sc. ii. of the Duke of Newcastle's "The Humorous Lovers" (produced about 30 March, 1667), is laid there, and Etherege in the sprightly first scene of the second act of his "She Wou'd if She Cou'd" had also anticipated Sedley by placing the Mulberry Garden on the stage. Wycherley followed Newcastle, Sedley and Etherege by laying the first scene of "Love in a Wood or St. James's Park," in "The Dining-Room in Mulberry Garden House." Shadwell alludes to the Mulberry Garden's bad reputation in "The Humourists" (4to, 1670), Act III. where Friske, a woman of the town, says to her friend, Mrs. Striker: "O me, Madam, why does not your Ladyship frequent the Mulberry Garden oftner? I vow we had the pleasanest Divertizement there last Night." To which Striker replies, "Ay, I was there, Mrs. Friske; and the Garden was very full, Madam, of Gentlemen and Ladies, that made love together till twelve a Clock at Night, the prettily'st, I vow 'twould do one's Heart good to see them."

Finally, in Betterton's "Amorous Widow" (8vo, 1706; produced c. 1670) Lovemore asks Lady Laycock if she walks "in the evenings into St. James's Park or into the Mulberry Garden," and praises the "wilder-ness" that Pepys found "somewhat pretty."

"Bellamira, or the Mistress," Sedley's second comedy, was produced at the King's house in May 1687 and printed in the same year. The only contemporary criticism which survives is that of Sedley's old friend, Sir George Etherege, who wrote of it in the following words from Ratisbon to the Duke of Buckingham: "my witty Friend Sir C S . . . y's 'Bellamira' gave me that intire Satisfaction that I cannot read it over too often."¹ This high commendation from such a good judge as Sir George is not undeserved, and we can agree without hesitation to Genest's emphatic statement that "this is by far the best of Sedley's plays." Beside these judgments should be placed the opinion of the author whose curt dismissal of Sedley's dramatic works has already been quoted: "It is difficult to imagine the time when such a coarse and atrocious production as the play in question could have been tolerated on the English stage."

"Bellamira" has exactly the qualities that "The Mulberry Garden" lacked: organic unity, vigour and sustained interest. The silly "heroic" element which disfigured the earlier comedy has entirely disappeared and the whole is written in admirably easy and lucid prose with a fine racy flavour. "The Mulberry Garden" is the work of a young beau, slightly effeminate and distinctly boyish. "Bellamira" is mature and masculine. Acute observation of contemporary life combined with the study of the classics and of Shakespeare, of which this play bears obvious signs, have borne fruit in a comedy of manners which is worthy to be ranked beside the best work of Wycherley and Etherege, and only falls below the dazzling achievements of the mature Congreve. The words "coarse and atrocious" seem singularly inapplicable to such a play, and can only be explained as representing the criticism of an age which was quite unable to understand or appreciate the purely intellectual and non-moral view of life which the authors of the comedies of manners expressed in their plays. Any lover of fine English prose should be able to enjoy the manner of "Bellamira." To appreciate its matter it is necessary to share Charles Lamb's delight at finding plays in which there is "a privation of moral light" and "a happy breathing place from the burthen of moral questioning." In the words of the same critic, the characters of "Bellamira" "break through no laws or conscious restraints. They know of none," or, to quote one of themselves, "in matter of women" they "are all in a State of Nature, every man's hand against every man."

¹ Buckingham's "Miscellaneous Works," 8vo, 1704, p. 140; letter from Etherege to Buckingham dated Ratisbon, October 21, 1689.

The main features of "Bellamira" are borrowed or rather adapted directly from the "Eunuch" of Terence, which is itself an adaptation of a lost Greek comedy by Menander of the same name. A comparison with the Latin original will show how remarkably Sedley's sense of dramatic form and architecture had developed since "The Mulberry Garden," and with what consummate skill he turned the work of the Latin author into a play which breathes the very spirit of Restoration England.

In Terence's play, Phaedria, a young Athenian gentleman, elder son of old Laches, is infatuated with Thais, a beautiful courtesan. She begs her lover to go into the country for a few days in order to give place to Thraso, a braggart soldier. Her excuse is that she wishes to obtain from Thraso a slave girl called Pamphila, who was brought up as her foster sister. Pamphila is actually a freeborn Athenian, who was kidnapped as an infant by pirates and sold to Thais's parents, and Thais has a shrewd suspicion of her origin. Phaedria sends Parmeno, his adroit and humorous valet, with a eunuch and a black girl as presents to Thais. Phaedria's younger brother, Chaerea, sees Pamphila and falls violently in love with her. At Parmeno's suggestion, he dresses up as the eunuch and is delivered to Thais who is delighted with his beauty and intelligence. His object is, of course, to be left alone with Pamphila. When this is achieved, he is overcome by passion, ravishes her and makes good his escape. Chremes, another young gentleman and a friend of Chaerea, is sent for by Thais, who suspects that Pamphila is related to him. When he arrives he finds that Thais has gone to sup with Thraso. He joins them and the soldier becomes drunk and quarrelsome, and insults Thais by shouting for Pamphila. She leaves the banquet and returns home with Chremes. Meanwhile Phaedria has returned and learned of his brother's escapade. Chremes receives proof from Thais that Pamphila is his sister, and, when Thraso comes with a ragged army of his followers to storm Thais's house, and carry Pamphila off, he is daunted by the news that she is a freeborn Athenian. Parmeno is frightened by Pythias, Thais's slave, who tells him in jest that, as Pamphila is a free citizen, Chremes is going to inflict on Chaerea the traditional Athenian punishment for ravishers. He goes and confesses all to old Laches, who is very angry at first, but who becomes reconciled to his sons when he discovers that Chaerea has arranged with Chremes to marry Pamphila. An excellent final touch is given by Gnatho, Thraso's parasite and flatterer. For a weighty consideration he promises the soldier to get him readmitted into Thais's house. He sends Thraso away and suggests to Phaedria that he should allow Thais to receive Thraso, as the latter is too ridiculous to be a serious rival, and is sufficiently wealthy and foolish to keep them all in funds besides supplying an endless source of amusement. Phaedria consents and Thraso calls back his patron, who is overjoyed by the cordial reception which he receives, and which he ascribes entirely to the information concerning his rank and achievements which had been imparted by his admiring friend.

The play is a typical production of the Athenian New Comedy. It is neat, elegant and a little bloodless. The discreet humour of Gnatho's ironical flatteries, Parmeno's elaborate intrigues, the lovelorn Phaedria and his good-humoured but business-like mistress are all characteristic of the art of a small, highly civilised but tired and over-refined community. The most notable adaptation of it in a modern language before Sedley's was "L'Eunuque" of La Fontaine, published in 1654, but never acted. La Fontaine follows Terence fairly closely, but departs from his original in one important detail. Pamphila, in Terence's play, like most virtuous women in the New Comedy, is mute, and we only hear the story of her rape from Chaerea. La Fontaine's Pamphile is a speaking character, and for the incident of the rape there is substituted a scene where Chérée, disguised as the eunuch, is left alone with Pamphile in the house of Thais and makes honourable love to her in polished alexandrines, revealing to her his rank and promising to marry her, and departing after obtaining permission to kiss her hand. Although Sedley does not follow La Fontaine in this departure from Terence, there is at least one passage which inclines me to think that he knew the French play.¹ But he handled his original on the whole in a far freer manner

¹ Cf. Terence, Eunuchus, II. 365-368:

"Chaer. O fortunatum istum eunuchum qui quidem in hanc detur domum!

Par. Quid ita?

Chaer. Rogitas? summa forma semper conservam domi videbit, conloquetur, aderit una in unis ædibus; cibum non numquam capiet cum ea; interdum propter dormiet"; with La Fontaine, L'Eunuque (Œuvres, Paris, 1827, IV. 58), II. iv.:

"Chérée. S'il est ainsi reçu, qu'il me donne d'envie!

Parmenon. Vous préservent les dieux d'un heur pareil au sien! Ce seroit pour Pamphile un mauvais entretien.

Chérée. Quoi! garder une fille et si jeune et si belle! Coucher en même chambre, et manger auprès d'elle"; and Sedley, "Bellamira," II. i. 8:

"Lion. Oh, happy Eunuch! that art to live in the same house with this Divine Creature.

than the French author. His chief departure from Terence's scheme is inspired by a remarkably sound instinct. He hit on the character who is the real centre of the action in the "Eunuch" as the most essentially un-English thing in the play. By changing this character into a person who is at once thoroughly English and characteristic of Sedley's own age, he has altered the whole tone of the play and, as it were, has brought it out of the close atmosphere of Levantine intrigue into the fresh air of the Park and the Mall. The character in question is that of Parmeno, the crafty rascal of a valet and the real hero of Terence's comedy, whose versatile and adroitly unscrupulous character is typical of the popular heroes of Southern Europe. Had Molière or Beaumarchais adapted the play we can be sure that somebody very like Sganarelle, Mascarille or Figaro would have appeared in Parmeno's place. Sedley rightly felt that such a character was an exotic in England, where valets have never been popular, and has made the whole play intimately English by substituting for Parmeno a jolly old toper called Merryman, who is the boon companion of Keepwell (Phaedria's English counterpart). Merryman's name, as well as that of his rival, Cunningham, comes from Betterton's "The Amorous Widow" (acted about 1670), and the hint of a contrast between a fat and a thin suitor may, as Genest remarks, have been given by James Howard's absurdly crude farce, "All Mistaken" (acted 1667, published 1672), but his character is borrowed from neither of these plays. It is impossible that it should not have been to some extent suggested by that of Thomas Shadwell, whose connection with this play has already been Merr. Why so? the nearer he is to a fine Woman the more sensible he must be of his loss.

Lion. But he'll see continually his fair fellow Servant, sit by sometimes and talk with her. . . ."

It is noticeable that Sedley has amplified Parmeno's simple "Quid ita" in a very similar way to La Fontaine.

noticed.¹ Merryman is a great jolly tun of a man like Shadwell, and like him gloriés in the depth of his potations. And when Keepwell finds him in an embarrassing situation he sings to him three lines of one of Shadwell's own songs.²

If Merryman owes something to Shadwell, he has a still more illustrious progenitor. His speeches immediately call to mind the words of no less a person than Sir John Falstaff. They have exactly Falstaff's relish and gusto. What more Falstaffian words have ever been penned than these?

"Survey my Bulk: it was not built for hast;
'tis the slow Product of Tuns of Claret, Chines of Beef, Ven'son Pastyes, and so-forth," and what other character except Sir John could have inspired such a description as this?

"Peace, thou moving Dropsie, that wadlest with Fat, worse than a Goose with Egg."

Sedley's other important deviation from Terence's work is in the treatment of the female characters. His Bellamira is a very different person from that very conventional hetæra, Thais. She is said³ to be modelled after Barbara Palmer, Countess of Castlemaine and afterwards Duchess of Cleveland, the most beautiful and dissolute harlot of the Court of Charles II, and there is no reason to disbelieve the tradition. When Keepwell is away she is unfaithful as a matter of course, and

¹ See above, p. 169.

² "Bellamira," IV. i.:

"Her Breasts of Delight are two Bottles of White and her Eyes are two Cups of Canary."

The lines are from a song sung by Clodpate in "Epsom Wells," V. i.

³ By Genest: "Some Account of the English Stage," I. 455.

instead of supping with her military suitor like Thais, she tells him to meet her in "the walk you know of by Kensington." When he has gone to the rendezvous she dresses in men's clothes and, in company with Merryman, waylays the braggart, thoroughly frightens him and relieves him of his medals and superfluous coin. The picture of Restoration life is made more convincing by the introduction of another female character, Thisbe, the ward of Merryman, who has no counterpart in Terence. She is courted both by her guardian and the lean rake, Cunningham, who is said to be a portrait of that Colonel Jack Churchill who nearly married Sir Charles's daughter, Katherine. Although a virtuous woman, she is on intimate terms with Bellamira, and such a connection was as natural in Restoration England as it was impossible in the Athens of Menander. One of the most brilliant passages in the play is a conversation between the two women which tells us more about the demi-monde of the reign of Charles II than all the history books:

This. You are a great Politician.

Bell. There goes more to our Trade, than a good Face; I have known many of these unthinking Butterflies, Debauch'd, Pox'd, and in Gaol, the same Summer: Let's up into my Chamber; I must set myself out for Dangerfield he'l be here anon.

This. They say he has been Hansome.

Bell. 'Twas so long ago every Body has forgot it but himself: He is a Pretender to Wit; but his is worse than none: as a Country Scraper is worse than no Musick at all.

This. And yet this Fellow for a little Mony——

Bell. No, for a great deal of Mony. I will make the Presents he gives me, my Baits to Catch others with: fine Cloaths and rich Furniture, are great Provocatives to those that don't pay for 'em, which are the Men for our Turn.

This. Like the Gentlemen that live in Town, you have your pleasure in one place and receive your Rent from an other: 'tis the way to have your Tenement thrown into your Hands.

Bell. Keepwell has taken a Lease for Life, and laid out so much in Improvements, that I am secure of him; and for the Rest, they shall pay me as they are Able.

This. My Guardian and I have now and then a small Quarrel, about my keeping you so much Company.

Bell. Does he not see that we Govern the Town? Have Power and Plenty follow us? we Visit, Dance, Play at Cards, go to Hide Park, St. James's, and Sup together, and are a World among our Selves.

This. But like the Inhabitants of the other World, you neither Marry nor are given in Marriage; and he wou'd have me fit for a Husband.

Bell. Get Mony enough and you can never want a Husband. A Husband is a good Bit to Close ones Stomach with, when Love's Feast is over. Who wou'd begin a Meal with Cheese? Come into my Chamber, and I will instruct thee farther in these Mysteries."

The passage which illustrates best how Sedley's power in comic dialogue had increased since the "Mulberry Garden" is that in which Lionel (the English Chaerea) tells Merryman of his first glimpse of Isabella (the counterpart of Pamphila):

"Merry. What's the matter? you look as if you were Drunk.

Lion. I am worse; I am mad; I am anything; I am in Love.

Merry. How Keepwell will Laugh at you! But with whom?

Lion. Not with a stale Wench, like him; nor with any of the little Tinsel, short Liv'd Beauties of the Town, squeez'd into shape by Taylors, and starv'd into it by their Mothers.

Merry. How then?

Lion. A new turn of a Face, unknown till now to Nature's self, in all her Numberless Varieties.

Merry. 'Tis wond'rous; you are Maul'd; Cupid has shot you with a Blunderbus.

Lion. What eyes! Teeth white . . .

Merry. As a new Tobacco-pipe.

Lion. Peace, Prophane Wretch, thou art not fit to mingle in these Misteries. Her own Complexion; Her Body solid and full of Juice; the Noblest Fabrick of unstinted Nature!

Merry. Her Age?

Lion. Seventeen.

Merry. I have drunk excellent Hockamore of that Age.

Lion. Damn thy dull Hockamore and thy base Jaded Pallat, that affects it; Cou'd I but get this Divine Creature into my hands by Fraud, Force, Price, Prayer, any way so that I enjoy her, I care not.

Merry. Who is She? she may be a Person of Quality, and you may bring an old house upon your head.

Lion. 'Tis but a Duel or two that way; and if her Relations be Numerous, we'll Fight Six to Six and make an end on't.

Merry. What Country Woman is she?

Lion. I know not.

Merry. Where does she live?

Lion. I can't tell.

Merry. We are upon a very cold Scent : where did you see her?

Lion. In the Street; with a Servant behind her.

Merry. How come you to lose her?

Lion. That's it I was cursing at: Nor do I think there is a Man whom all the Stars conspire against like me. What Crime have I committed to be thus Plagu'd?

Merry. The Stars are Pretty Twinkling Rogues, that light us home, when we are Drunk sometimes, but neither care for you nor me nor any man."

This is abler dialogue and finer prose than anything which had hitherto been produced by the Wits outside the best passages in "Sir Fopling Flutter" and "The Country Wife." It flows as easily as conversation, and yet, to use Synge's fine simile, "every speech is as fully flavoured as a nut or apple." The bouts of abuse between the fat drunkard, Merryman, and the lean rake, Cunningham, are obviously suggested by the similar passages at arms between Falstaff and Prince Hal. They are not unworthy of such distinguished parentage: the final "flyting" has a splendid and joyous extravagance in which we can detect what is perhaps the last embodiment of the lusty old English comedy that began with the farces of John Heywood and reached its zenith in Falstaff and Sir Toby Belch:

"Cunn. Every man's constitution will not run out into Fat, 'tis the Commendation of a Capon: a good Cock is alwaies lean as I am.

Merr. A good Coxcomb alwaies thinks well of himself; why, thou lean Rascal Deer, thou visible Pox, thou Common-shore of Physick, Reproach of Doctors and Ruine of Apothecari's, who Flux'st away thy Flesh as often as an Adder cast his Skin and art full as venemous.

Cunn. I am sure you look like a full Moon or a Fat Bawd swell'd with the Tooth Ach.

Merr. When I walk the Streets, men say there goes an honest well natur'd Fat Fellow to drink a bottle with, and a good Husband I warrant him.

Cunn. A good Cuckold perhaps: but the Ladies cry foh, there goes a greasie Sot, a Chandler's Shop in the shape of a man, a meer Lump, a Sponge full of Terse¹: whose mouth stinks worse than the Bung hole of a Barrel, a Load of manifest impotency, Guts and Garbage for the Bear Garden.

Merr. Thou meer stake to hang Cloaths upon, thou Scarrow,² thou piece of Shrivil'd Parchment, thou walking Skelleton, that may'st be read upon alive, can'st thou think any Woman so sharp set as to pick thy rotten Bones, which are but the leaving of Pox, Mercury and Consumption?"

This passage and indeed the whole play is a perfect dramatic example of that quality of gusto that Hazlitt desiderated in all forms of art. By infusing English red blood into the shapely Terentian form, Sedley has produced a type of the comedy of manners that stands completely alone. It is wholly free from the satiric and moral purpose of Wycherley's finest work, and in spirit is akin rather to the masterpieces of Etherege and Congreve. But whereas the comedies of these authors are concerned chiefly with the slightly affected atmosphere of the drawing-rooms and boudoirs of fine ladies, Sedley's play is a comedy of manners that deals rather with the bohemian world of the tavern and the demi-monde, and yet retains the fine aristocratic flavour which is essential to the type. It succeeds in doing what Shadwell attempted throughout a great part of his career and never quite accomplished.

¹ i.e. claret.

² i.e. scarecrow.

It is a pity that instead of producing more comedies like "Bellamira," Sedley spent a great deal of his time in trying to achieve what was entirely beyond his powers. The passion, the high seriousness and profound ethical sense necessary for the writing of great tragedy were not compatible with the qualities of the circle of Charles II and "Gentle George," and it must be admitted that Sedley's tragedy of "Antony and Cleopatra," produced at the Duke's house in 1676, deserves most of the unkind things which the critics have said of it, even though we grant that almost any play on the story is likely to seem feeble beside the masterpieces of Shakespeare and Dryden. Sedley's play has indeed found one defender¹ in Prof. R. H. Case, the editor of the Arden edition of Shakespeare's "Antony and Cleopatra," who describes it as "full of life, bustle, combat and siege," and who thinks that "the whole can appeal, if we forget Shakespeare." Prof. Case's defence is perhaps justified if we regard the play purely as a piece of stage carpentry, a libretto for Clark's music. But it must always be matter for astonishment that the author of "Phyllis is my only Joy" and "Bellamira" could have produced a piece of this length with hardly a single passage of real literary excellence.

It is true that the ranting which disfigures most of the riming tragedies of the reign of Charles II is not to be found in Sedley's "Antony and Cleopatra," but the colourless, conventional diction and the unenterprising metre make us almost long for the wildest moments of Almanzor and Maximin. Imagine Antony, the Antony of Plutarch and of Shakespeare, speaking like this:

¹ I am not reckoning such uncritical estimates as those of Shadwell, who wrote, "in this Play the Romans are true Romans, and their Style is such; and I dare affirm that there is not in any Play of this Age so much of the Spirit of the Classick Authors, as in your Antony and Cleopatra" (Dedication of "A True Widow"); and Ayloffe, who in his preface to Sedley's Miscellaneous Works (1702) remarks that "Cleopatra dy'd not more gallantly in Alexandria than by our Author in Drury Lane"!

"The timorous Deer, their female standing by,
Each other will to Wounds and Death defie.
Love gives short courage to the meanest soul,
The creeping things he arms, and winged fowl.
Yet overcharg'd with love, I lost the day,
And in my Mistress's presence ran away."

And imagine the dying Cleopatra apostrophising the asp thus:

"Good Asp, bite deep and deadly in my breast
And give me sudden and eternal rest."

The only passages that have the slightest literary value are one or two cynical epigrams that are quite unsuitable to such a setting:

"Let Fools the Fame of Loyalty divide, Wise men and Gods are on the strongest side."

The love of Antony and Cleopatra and the struggle in Antony's mind between love and honour, which must surely dominate the whole action in a successful play on this theme, are obscured in Sedley's piece by other motifs that are not particularly interesting in themselves, and which are quite unwarranted by history. Plutarch tells how Photinus, an Egyptian eunuch, plotted against Julius Cæsar and Cleopatra, when the former was in Egypt, and Corneille uses the story as part of the main action of his "La Mort de Pompée," which Sedley helped to translate in his youth. In his "Antony and Cleopatra" Sedley transfers the story of Photinus's plot and insurrection to the time of the final defeat of Antony by Octavius, and embroiders it by making Photinus a zealous Egyptian statesman, who aspires to the crown of Egypt and the hand of Iras, Cleopatra's favourite. And, as though this were not enough to disturb the balance of the story he has to introduce another unnecessary and unhistorical subplot by making Mæcenus the devoted but unsuccessful suitor of Octavia! The division of the characters into pairs of lovers almost reduces the great legend to the level of comic opera. However, we have at least one reason to be thankful for "Antony and Cleopatra." There is a tradition, preserved by Eusden,¹ the eighteenth-century poet (1688-1730), that it suggested the theme to Dryden, and so Sedley may be held to have an indirect responsibility for the finest Restoration tragedy, "All for Love."

The play called "Beauty the Conquerour, or the Death of Marc Antony," printed in the 1702 edition of Sedley's Miscellaneous Works, is not, as Sir A. W. Ward incorrectly states, in his "History of English Dramatic Literature" (III. 446), a reprint of "Antony and Cleopatra." It is an unfinished reconstruction of that play as a classical tragedy with a chorus that sings lyrics between the acts. The character of Octavia is eliminated, and the place of Photinus is taken by Achilles, an Egyptian captain, mentioned by Plutarch.² The couplets are mostly taken from the earlier version, though they are re-arranged and slightly altered, and a few additions are made, of which the following passage will serve as a specimen:

"We on proud Rome shall see ourselves Reveng'd,
Her Laws struck dumb, and her Republick Chang'd.
Romans shall welter in each other's Blood,
And Nile-bred Monsters drink the Purple Flood."

The lyrics are obviously incomplete, but the fragments do not give the impression that Sedley was ¹ "So Dryden sweetest sang, by envy fir'd,

Thirst of Revenge, when Phoebus fail'd inspir'd;
His Anthony did Sedley's muse o'ertake,
And Absolom was writ for Zimri's sake."

"On a Lady who is the most beautiful and witty when she is angry."

"The Shorter Poems of the Eighteenth Century," ed. Iolo Williams, 1923, p. 140.

² In one obviously unfinished passage in Act V. sc. i., the abbreviation "Pho" appears before two of his speeches.

likely to succeed as a writer of the statelier forms of ode.

Two other dramatic pieces are printed in the 1722 edition of Sedley's Collected Works. One is a very literal translation of the famous French farce, "Le Grondeur."¹ This piece was twice adapted for the stage in the eighteenth century, firstly by Garrick in 1754,² and secondly by Goldsmith as a benefit for Quick, the actor, in 1773.³ A specimen scene from Goldsmith's version is printed in his Miscellaneous Works.⁴

The presence of this piece in the edition of 1722 is no guarantee that it is Sedley's, as many of the contents of that edition are certainly spurious. There is, however, no great improbability that he may have amused himself by making such a translation in his last years, perhaps for a private performance. The other is entitled "The Tyrant King of Crete," and is merely a shortened version of a very poor play by Henry Killigrew called "Pallantus and Eudora," printed in folio in 1653. It had been written by Killigrew for the marriage of Lady Mary Villiers and Lord Charles Herbert as early as 1638. A printed version of it appeared in that year under the title of "The Conspiracy," which, according to Killigrew, was published without his permission from "a false and imperfect Transcript."⁵ The dialogue of all three versions is in a blank verse that has reached the last stage of degeneration, and is often only distinguishable from prose by the fact that it is cut into lengths of approximately ten syllables. The only evidence that Sedley had anything to do with it is its inclusion in the edition of 1722 that contains pieces which are certainly not from his pen, and the only conceivable excuse for

¹ By Brueys and Palaprat, produced at the Théâtre Français, 1691.

² Genest, IV. 391.

³ Forster's "Life and Times of Goldsmith" (ed. 1871), II. 342.

⁴ Miscellaneous Works, London, 1837, 8vo, IV. 333.

⁵ "Pallantus and Eudora," fol. 1653, Preface.

its appearance among his works is that Killigrew may have asked him to correct it and that a version with his corrections may have been found among his papers at his death. It is time, however, that he was freed from all responsibility for this shapeless mass, which has been falsely attributed to him for two centuries.

CHAPTER II

THE NON-DRAMATIC WORKS; AND TRANSLATIONS

“For pointed Satyrs I would Buckhurst chuse,
The best good Man, with the worst natur’d Muse,
For Songs and Verses, mannerly, obscene,
That then stir Nature up by Spring unseen,
And without forcing Blushes, warm the Queen.
Sidley has that prevailing gentle Art,
That can with a resistless Charm impart
The loosest Wishes to the chastest Heart,
Raise such a conflict, kindle such a Fire
Betwixt declining Virtue and Desire,
Till the poor vanquisht Maid dissolves away
In Dreams all Night, in Sighs and Tears all Day.”

“An Allusion to Harace (sic), the tenth Satyr on the First Book.” Poems, etc., by the Right Honourable the E. of R. (Rochester),
Antwerpen (n.d. ? 1680), pp. 41-42.

“Here gentle Etheridge’s and Sidley’s Muse
Warm the coy Maid, and melting Love infuse:
No unchaste Words with harsh offensive Sound
The tender Ears of blushing Virgins wound;
Nor Thought, which nauseous Images inspire,
And damp the glowing Heat of soft Desire:
But calm and easy the sweet Numbers move,
And every Verse is influenced by Love.”

Mr. Charles Tooke: “To a Young Lady with the first edition of A Collection of Poems, viz. The Temple of Death, etc.,” third edition, 12mo, 1716, p. 2.

“But for the Wits of either Charles’s days,
The Mob of Gentlemen who wrote with Ease;
Sprat, Carew, ^{the} Sedley, and a thousand more,
(Like twinkling stars the Miscellanies o’er)
One Simile that solitary shines
In the dry desert of a thousand lines,

Or lengthen'd Thought that gleams through many a page
Has sanctified whole poems for an age."

Pope, "Imitations of Horace," Bk. II. Ep. I.
ll. 107-114.

"Sir Ch. . . . that can write and better Translate
Was likewise Deny'd it,¹ for he'd an Estate,
And from Homer to D. . . . n it never was known
That the Laureat had three Pence a Year of his own."

Prior, "A Session of the Poets" (Poems from the Longleat MSS., Cambridge English Classics, 1907, p. 301).

POPE in conversation with Spence remarked that Sedley was "an insipid poet except in a few of his little love verses."² The exception is important, because the "little love verses" are the one portion of his writings which have kept his memory alive and which are still appreciated by the general reader. It is true that the critic who found "Bellamira" "atrocious" has little use for Sedley as a poet: "From his amatory poems," he writes, "we will make no extracts. It may be a fine point whether at their worst Sedley or Rochester was the coarsest writer of the pair (sic)."³ Thomas Bailey, a nineteenth-century historian of Nottinghamshire, writes that Sedley "was in his day much distinguished for his poetical talents . . . but his verses being chiefly devoted to loose and amorous subjects, his fame perished with the voluptuous age in which he lived."⁴ These critics are merely following in the footsteps of such earlier writers as the authors of the articles on Sedley in Cibber's "Lives of the Poets" (1753) and "Biographia Britannica" (1763). The former tells us that Sedley's verses are "amorous, tender and delicate, yet have not much strength nor

¹ i.e. the laureateship.

² Spence's "Observations, Anecdotes and Characters," ed. Malone, 1820, p. 89.

³ T. Longueville in "Rochester and Other Literary Rakes of the Restoration," p. 78.

⁴ T. Bailey, "Annals of Nottinghamshire," IV. 62 (8vo, 1853).

do they exhibit great marks of genius," and speaks of them as "propagating the immoralities of the times," while the latter writes that his "art wholly consisted of raising loose thoughts and lewd desires without giving any alarm and so that the poison worked slowly and irresistibly." These criticisms may be traced to three causes. The first is the nimbus of scandal which surrounded the poet's memory, and which interested compilers of literary biography far more than a study of the poems themselves. The second is Rochester's allusion in his "Imitation¹ of the Tenth Satire of the First Book of Horace," which is taken as a serious criticism instead of what it obviously is, a piece of amusing chaff which might have been written about any writer of love lyrics by a playful friend. The third is the fact that Sedley's works have been studied almost wholly in a series of dishonest editions published many years after his death, which contain a number of coarse and inferior pieces that were never attributed to him in his lifetime, and that in some cases can be definitely proved to be the work of other authors.² Sedley's verse has not, however, wanted defenders. His earliest editor and "affinity," Captain Ayloffe, not inaptly compares it to the "gallant easie wit of Horace," and sixty-three years later Dr. J. Langhorne, in his "Effusions of Fancy and Friendship,"³ distinguished Sedley from "the Mob of Gentlemen who wrote with Ease," and ascribed to him "a good deal of wit, some genius and a tolerable ear." This critic devotes seven pages to an excellent analysis of Sedley's non-dramatic works, illustrated by well-chosen quotations.

Nearly a century after Langhorne Sir Francis Palgrave, in his notes to "The Golden Treasury,"

¹ Quoted at the head of this chapter.

² For a complete account of the text and canon of Sedley's work see the Preface to my forthcoming edition of his Works.

³ "The Effusions of Fancy and Friendship," by J. Langhorne, London, 2766, II. 157-64.

mentions "the courtly compliments" of Sedley as the latest example of "the poetry of simple passion" before its revival in the age of Burns and Cowper, and A. H. Bullen, in the introduction to his "Musa Proterva" (1889), writes: "From Sir Charles Sedley I have drawn very freely. In his own sphere Sedley is unapproachable; such songs as 'Love still has something of the sea,' or 'Phyllis is my only Joy,' easily outdistance all rivals. He does not occupy an exalted place in English literature, but that place is secure." Bullen's appreciation of Sedley's best lyrics is repeated in a more critical form by Mr. Whibley in his article on the Restoration Court Poets in the "Cambridge History of English Literature," and Sir Walter Raleigh in his monograph on Milton gives high praise to "the self-abandonment and passion" of two or three of Sedley's songs.

To appreciate properly the qualities of Sedley's verse, it is necessary to understand the position of the group to which he belonged in the history of the English lyric. These authors form the last genuine school of English Court poets, and with them the tradition of Court poetry which began with the circle of Wyatt and Surrey in the reign of Henry VIII came to an end. There was, of course, Court poetry before Henry VIII and after Charles II, but neither before nor after was it considered an essential accomplishment of a courtier to write verse. However far Rochester, Sedley, Buckhurst and their friends may have fallen in their conduct below the great ideal of the Renaissance courtier as set forth by Baldassare Castiglione and even of Peacham, his English disciple, the conventions of their poetry are still to a large extent the conventions of the Renaissance Court life which placed on what Palgrave calls courtly compliments a value which it is difficult for a modern mind to understand. It is in their verse that we find almost for the last time the successful use of those pastoral names and metaphors which Virgil and the Greek romances had handed down as a sort of sacred language for courtly lovers. They are the last poets who can talk gracefully if not quite seriously about shepherdesses and swains and flames and darts.¹ On the other hand, they were something more than the last practitioners of the courtly manner. They were really important figures in the history of the great change that came over English poetry in the course of the seventeenth century. That change may be roughly described as the triumph of the intellectual and logical side of the Renaissance over the imaginative and emotional elements. All poetry worthy of the name, of course, from its very nature is to some extent imaginative and emotional as well as intellectual and logical. Even in the works of Poe or Mallarmé, the latter elements are not wholly suppressed any more than the former are in the verses of Swift or Voltaire. What has been called the "classical" or "Augustan" period of English poetry was a period when colour and passion and music were comparatively (but it must be insisted, only comparatively) subordinated to the demands of logical thought and clarity of statement. The very great esteem in which such Latin poets as Horace, Ovid, Martial and Juvenal were held by all the leading scholars and critics must have had a great deal to do with the change, and this esteem, together with the influence of social changes, would probably have brought it about without the example of contemporary France, which only helped a tendency that was already strong, and that can be traced back as far as the poems of Ben Jonson.

The other strain in English seventeenth-century poetry besides the Renaissance Court tradition and the "classical" tendency towards logic and clarity was

¹ I am not forgetting Pope's Pastorals. They are, however, in spite of the charm of several fine passages, merely the schoolboy exercises of the great poet of the "Rape of the Lock," the "Satires" and the "Dunciad."

Doth yield her sweets, since he is fair,
 And courts her with a gentle air,
 Our stars do show their excellence
 Not by their light but influence;
 When brighter comets, since still known,
 Fatal to all are liked by none.
 So your admired beauty still Is by effects made good or ill."

It must have been from Waller, his mother's friend, that the young Sedley learned to write verses with exactly the same flowing rhythm, lucid thought and easy and rather obvious imagery:

"Cloris, I cannot say your Eyes
 Did my unwary Heart surprise;
 Nor will I swear it was your Face,
 Your Shape, or any nameless Grace:
 For you are so intirely Fair,
 To love a Part, injustice were;
 No drowning Man can know which Drop
 Of Water his last Breath did stop;
 So when the Stars in Heaven appear,
 And joyn to make the Night look clear;
 The Light we no one's Bounty call,
 But the obliging Gift of all.
 He that does Lips, or Hands adore,
 Deserves them only, and no more;
 But I love All and every Part,
 And nothing less can ease my Heart.
Cupid, that Lover, weakly strikes,
 Who can express what 'tis he likes."¹

This kind of graceful, complimentary and quite unimpassioned love poetry, which unites admirably the logic and lucidity of the "classical" strain with the courtliness of the Renaissance tradition, is the first type of poetry practised by the Wits. What a relief its clearness and obvious good sense must have been to a generation surfeited with "enthusiasm" and metaphysical raptures of all kinds! Sedley is perhaps the ablest of the group in turning such pretty compliments:

¹ "Miscellaneous Works" (1702), pp. 15, 16.

"Your Words fell on my Passion like those Showers
Which Paint and multiply the rising Flowers;
Like Cupid's self, a God and yet a Child,
Your Looks at once were awful, and yet mild."¹

"As in those Nations, where they yet adore
Marble and Cedar, and their Aid, implore:
'Tis not the Workman, nor the precious Wood,
But 'tis the Worshipper that makes the God:
So cruel Fair, though Heaven has giv'n you all
We Mortals (Vertue or can Beauty) call,
'Tis we that give the Thunder to your Frowns,
Darts to your Eyes, and to ourselves the wounds:"²

Buckingham was probably alluding to dainty work of this kind when he spoke of Sedley's "Witchcraft."³ It may not be love poetry as it was understood by Shakespeare and Shelley, but it would have pleased Mrs. Millamant. Indeed she seems to have known the last lines and answered them admirably in the following words:

"O the Vanity of these Men! Fainall, d'ee hear him? If they did not commend us, we were not handsome? Now you must know they could not commend one, if one was not handsome. Beauty the Lover's Gift—Lord, what is a Lover that it can give? Why, one makes Lovers as fast as one pleases, and they live as long as one pleases, and they die as soon as one pleases: And then if one pleases one makes more."⁴

Closely allied to these "courtly compliments" is a type of poetry which was practised by most of the fashionable poets of the day and which may be called

¹ Sedley's "Miscellaneous Works," 1702, p. 30.

² Ibid., p. 52.

³ "Some Account of the Life of Sir Charles Sedley," prefixed to the edition of 1722. The Author of this "Account" is the earliest authority that I can find for this criticism.

⁴ "The Way of the World" (ed. Montague Summers, 1925), II. i.

the Dresden China dialogue. In such pieces, a conventional shepherd and shepherdess discuss such subjects as Love, Honour and Constancy in dainty lyrical verse. This kind of poem, which is probably the descendant of the estrifs and pastourelles of the Middle Ages, tinged with memories of Virgilian eclogues and Horace's famous "Donec gratus eram tibi," is the exact literary antitype of the fêtes galantes of Watteau and Fragonard. It must be judged purely as decoration and its success depends wholly on lightness of touch. Sedley's "Amintas and Celia" is not inferior in this respect to Rochester's charming "Strephon and Daphne":

"Strephon.

Women can with Pleasure feign:
Men dissemble still with Pain.
What Advantage will it prove,
If I Lie, who cannot Love?

Daphne.

Tell me then the Reason why,
Love from Hearts in Love does fly?
Why the Bird will build a Nest
Where he ne'er intends to rest.

Strephon.

Love, like other little Boys,
Cries for Hearts, as they for Toys:
Which when gain'd in Childish Play,
Wantonly are thrown away."¹

"Celia.

Amintas, I am come alone,
A silly harmless Maid,
But whither is thy Honour flown?
I fear I am betray'd;
Thy Looks are chang'd and in the Place
Of innocent Desires,
Methinks I see thy Eyes and Face
Glow with unusual Fires.

¹ Rochester, "Poems on Several Occasions" (8vo, 1705), p. 2.

Amintas.

See's not my Celia, Nature wear
 One Countenance in the Spring,
 And yet another Shape prepare
 To bring the Harvest in?

Fears might my Infant Love become;
 'Twere want of vigor now
 Should modesty those Hopes benum,
 The Place and You allow."¹

The Wits are less successful when they attempt the full-length Virgilian eclogue, and I suspect that Pope was thinking of Sedley's "Pastoral Dialogue between Thirsis and Strephon" when he spoke of his insipidity:

"Strephon, O Strephon, once the jolliest Lad
 That with shrill Pipe did ever Mountain glad;
 Whilome the foremost at our Rural Plays:
 The Pride and Glory of our Holydays:
 Why dost thou now sit musing and alone,
 Teaching the Turtles yet a Sadder Moan?"

This reminds us less of Arcadia than of Lady Wishfort when she longed to "retire to Desarts and Solitudes, and feed harmless Sheep by Groves and purling Streams."² Sedley and Rochester could, however, forget sometimes that they were courtiers and disciples of Mr. Waller. Alone among the Wits they possessed the secret of writing songs that are as simple and direct and passionate as those of Lovelace and Brome and Jonson. In Rochester's

"My dear Mistress has a Heart,
 Soft as those kind Looks she gave me;
 When with Love's resistless Art,
 And her Eyes she did enslave me";

¹ Sedley in the "Miscellaneous Works," 1702, p. 40.

² "The Way of the World," V. i.

and Sedley's

"Not Celia, that I juster am
Or better than the rest,
For I would change each Hour like them,
Were not my Heart at rest,"

we hear for the last time before the age of Blake and Burns the singing voice which is also the genuine voice of passionate feeling. Sedley's song which is quoted above is his masterpiece in this manner and was written before 1672.¹ He retained his lyrical gift, however, when he was middle-aged and respectable, and it was probably after the Revolution that he produced his best known and most musical song.² In these lines he shows a power of metrical invention which is quite astonishing in the reign of William III:

"Phillis is my only Joy,
Faithless as the Winds or Seas;
Sometimes coming, sometimes coy,
Yet she never fails to please;
If with a Frown
I am cast down,
Phillis smiling,
And beguiling,
Makes me happier than before.

Tho', alas, too late I find,
Nothing can her fancy fix,
Yet the Moment she is kind
I forgive her all her Tricks;
Which tho' I see,
I can't get free;
She deceiving,
I believing;
What need Lovers wish for more?"

The playful tone of this song is found in other poems of Sedley and is not the least significant element in his work. What is interesting about the poetry of the Wits is the fact that they came to perceive the incongruity of their own intellectual and non-moral spirit and the old conventions of Renaissance poetry which they continued to use. They were all conscious of the justice of such criticisms as that of Prig in Shadwell's play:

¹ Sedley's "Miscellaneous Works," 1702, p. 11.

² Not printed till 1702, when it appeared in the "Miscellaneous Works."

"I observe you Wits are always making Songs of the Love of Shepherds and Shepherdesses; a Company of block-headed, clownish, ugly, tawny, Sun-burnt People; I had as lief hear songs upon the Love of their Sheep as their own."¹

Their realisation of this incongruity was expressed in different ways by the chief poets of the group according to their respective characters. Rochester's method was that of irony, well illustrated by his song called "Grecian Kindness":²

"There, the kind Deity of Wine
Kiss'd the soft wanton God of Love;
This clapp'd his Wings, that press'd his Vine;
And their best Pow'rs united move.
While each brave Greek embrac'd his Punk, Lull'd her asleep and then grew drunk."

This treatment of the heroic figures of literary tradition is not far from that of the ironical poets of the twentieth century:

"Often he wonders why on earth he went Troyward, or why poor Paris ever came,
Oft she weeps gummy-eyed and impotent;
Her dry shanks twitch at Paris' mumbled name.
So Menelaus nagged and Helen cried;
And Paris slept on by Scamander side."³

¹ "A True Widow," II. i. ("Collected Works," 1720, III. 147).

² Rochester, "Poems on Several Occasions," 1705, p. 21.

³ Rupert Brooke, "Menelaus and Helen" ("Collected Works," 1918, p. 93).

Buckhurst, "the best good man, with the worst natur'd Muse," found a solution of the problem in the writing of satire. His little poems on Lady Dorchester quoted in the first part of the present study are good examples of his success in that very rare and extremely difficult kind of poem, the satiric lyric. Sedley, who seems to have had a gentler character than either of his friends, expresses the gulf between the new spirit and the old conventions by using the latter in a half-playful manner:

"Phillis, this mighty Zeal asswage,
 You over-act your part;
 The Martyrs at your tender Age,
 Gave Heaven but half their Heart.

Old men (till past the Pleasure) ne're
 Declaim against the Sin,
 'Tis early to begin to fear
 The Devil at Fifteen."

This is the conventional address of the courtly lover to the cruel fair one, used by a poet who no longer took it seriously but regarded it as an amusing game. The famous Knotting Song is another exquisite example:

"The God of Love in thy bright Eyes
 Does like a Tyrant reign;
 But in thy Heart a Child he lyes,
 Without his Dart or Flame.
Phillis, without Frown or Smile
Sat and knotted all the while."

Such lines with their mixture of playfulness, sentiment and good breeding are the first real English vers de société, and Sedley has the honourable if not lofty distinction of founding the charming tradition which was to be carried on by Prior, Gay, Locker Lampson and Austin Dobson. No judgment on such works as the Knotting Song could be juster or better expressed than that of Professor Lascelles Abercrombie: "A delicious moment! and is there not an exquisitely personal distinction in it? And could anything be better as art than the precision and proportion of its rendering into language? But no one would suggest that Sedley's version of unpropitious love has anything of the quality we call greatness."¹ Anyone who comes to Sedley's poetry to find "the quality we call greatness" will be woefully disappointed. Only once does he approach what may be called the "great" manner. It is in that marvellous opening which has deserved the praise of countless critics:

"Love still has something of the Sea,
From whence his Mother rose."

The rest of the poem is competent in the manner of the Buckhursts and Mulgraves, but the first two lines for once carry us into the sphere of Sappho, of Catullus and of Landor.

In some late pieces Sedley abandons the last vestiges of the courtly convention and writes verses which are as realistic and unemotional as Swift's:

"There was a prudent grave Physician,
Careful of Patients as you'd wish one;
Much good he did with Purge and Glisters,
And well he knew to raise a Blister."

The series of Court Characters, which are chiefly clever imitations of Martial, belong to the same category. One couplet is worthy of quotation as a vivid picture of the society in which Sedley must have spent much of his time:

"Of all that starving Crew we saw to Day, None but has kill'd his Man, or writ his Play."

The long poem in heroic couplets called "The Happy Pair" was probably one of its author's latest works. Its subject must have been suggested by

¹ "The Idea of Great Poetry," 1925, p. 36.

Sedley's own unhappy matrimonial experience. It belongs to the new kind of reasoned and argumentative poetry first used effectively by Dryden in such pieces as "Religio Laici." A poet of the Elizabethan or the Victorian age who wished to treat the subject would certainly have used the symbolism of a classic or mediæval legend or a story of contemporary life. Had Sedley himself lived fifty years later, "The Happy Pair" would probably have been written in Thomsonian blank verse, and its argument would have been enlivened by "Episodes" like those of "The Seasons." As it is he treats his theme in general terms and describes the effect of ill-assorted marriages not upon Helen or Guinevere or Catherine of Braganza, but upon Man and Woman:

"This must be then our issue, where our Love
Does not together with our Nuptials move.
Possessions can't for fickle Joy provide,
When Love, the end of Living, is Destroy'd.
Alas! we're all mistaken in the Kind,
A Happy Man is measur'd by the Mind."

There is argument and example but no narrative. If the general form of Sedley's poem belongs to the age of prose and reason there is much of the seventeenth-century colour and music still in it. The lines describing the fall of man from innocence owe something to Milton, but they have ringing vigour of their own:

"When damning PRIDE, that Architect of Hell,
Made not, as yet, his Tempted Soul Rebel.
When plunging Avarice no Birth had found,
Nor tore the precious Entrails of the Ground."

And there is an emotional richness in lines like the following that was not common after Dryden:

"Cheek clings to Cheek, and swimming Eyes to Eyes."

The dualism in the matter of the poem is equally interesting. A large part of it is obviously suggested by the sixth Satire of Juvenal and is a description in the true "Augustan" manner of the blighting effects of mercenary marriages. Here are lines that follow Juvenal as any satirist in verse from Dryden to Gifford might have followed him:

"Man, like the sordid Earth, from which he sprung,
Corrupts his Soul by a base heap of Dung:
Forgetting the Celestial Form he bore,
He values not the Woman but her Store:
Extends his treach'rous Pledge to golden Charms,
And joins his hands to none but spangled Arms."¹

But the idealism of the "noble savage" and the praise of a rustic and "natural" life go back to the "heroic" plays which were popular in the poet's youth and forward to the new naturalism of the eighteenth century. The following passage in its tenderness, its feeling for nature and its metrical originality is quite extraordinary for the opening of the eighteenth century, and is probably unparalleled for these qualities at that date except by the remarkable works of Sedley's younger contemporary, Anne, Countess of Winchelsea:

"Love, like a cautious fearful Bird, ne'er builds,
But where the Place, Silence and Calmness yields:
He slily flies to Copses, where he finds
The snugging Woods secure from Blasts and Winds.
Shuns the huge Boughs of a more stately Form,
AndLaughs at Trees tore up with ev'ry Storm.
The pleasant Nightingale can ne'er be won,
To quit a Temp'rate Shade, to scorch i' the Sun;
In some low Grove, he sings his Charming Note,
And on a Thorn tunes the sweet warbling Throat."

When Wordsworth said that "A Nocturnal Reverie" and "Windsor Forest" were the only poems between "Paradise Lost" and "The Seasons" which contain new images of external Nature,² he had certainly forgotten Sedley's "snugging Woods." The whole passage both in form and matter (except perhaps for the epithet "Charming") suggests the age of Coleridge and Keats rather than that of Swift and Pope.

¹ Cf. Juvenal, Satire VI. ll. 136-41.

² Essay Supplementary to the Preface to the Second Edition of "Lyrical Ballads."

The existence of such poetry as this about the year 1700 should make us reconsider the old conception of a "romantic revival" following an "age of prose and reason," and regard the emotional and intellectual strains in English poetry as two elements which have always existed side by side, although one or the other may from time to time have assumed a special importance.

As a verse translator Sedley fully deserves the praise of Prior quoted at the head of the present chapter. Of his share in the early version of "Pompey the Great," in which he collaborated with Waller, Godolphin, Filmer and Buckhurst, it is difficult to speak with any certainty, as it is impossible to say which act was translated by him. As Waller is said to have translated the first and Buckhurst the last,¹ Sedley must be responsible for the second, third or fourth. In his own play, "Antony and Cleopatra," a few lines bear a faint resemblance to some words spoken by Cæsar in the third act of "Pompey,"² but this is hardly sufficient evidence on which to attribute the third act to him. As the Epilogue admits, the

¹ See pp. 80-83.

² The resemblance is rather in the sense than the actual words. Cæsar in his generous indignation at Pompey's death in the earlier play cries:

"What publique Joy had our sad Warr ensu'd,
If I and Pompey o're our former feud, Triumphant had in the same Chariot rid,"

and Octavius in Sedley's play expresses a very similar wish after the death of Antony:

"O what a Godlike pleasure it had been
With thee t' have shar'd the Empire once agen!
And to have made a Second Sacrifice
To friendship of each other's Enemies."

"Mounsieur is something altered" in his English dress. The translation is very free—free enough to be called a paraphrase—but this is probably due in part to the exigencies of the English audience, which would never have listened to the interminable tirades of Corneille's Romans.¹ In spite of some vigorous passages, the whole performance is less spirited and less faithful than the contemporary version of Mrs. Katherine Philips.²

Sedley's finest work as a translator is to be found in his version of the eighth ode of the second book of Horace. Page in his edition of Horace³ writes, that "this Ode has the peculiar interest of being perhaps the only Ode of Horace of which there is an adequate English rendering—that by Sir Charles Sedley." It is certainly the only version that will compare with Dryden's superb paraphrase of the twenty-ninth Ode of the same book. Unlike Dryden's work, however, it is a very literal translation, besides being an exquisite English poem. The reason for the translator's success is doubtless due in part to the fact that the original is written in a spirit very closely akin to that of the Restoration Wits. Sedley must have been thinking of the Cavaliers and Mazarins of his own day, who, like Horace's Barine, corrupted the youth of several generations when he wrote:

"The Nymphs and cruel Cupid too,
Sharp'ning his pointed Dart
On an old Hone, besmear'd with Blood,
Forbear thy perjur'd Heart.
Fresh Youth grows up to wear thy Chains,
And the old Slave no Freedom gains.

¹ E.g. in Act II. sc. ii., where the long account of Pompey's death given by Achoreus is only twice interrupted in the French original, but five times in the version of the English "confederates."

² See p. 82.

³ "Q. Horatii Flacci Carmina," edited by T. E. Page (Macmillan, 1909), p. 247.

Thee, Mothers for their eldest Sons,
Thee, wretched Misers fear,
Lest thy prevailing Beauty should Seduce the hopeful Heir:
New marry'd Virgins fear thy Charms¹
Should keep their Bridegroom from their Arms."

The translation of the Fourth Georgic, printed in the "Miscellaneous Works" of 1702 as "The Fourth Book of Virgil," is also an admirable piece of work and challenges a comparison even with Dryden's noble version. It has been well said of the latter that Vergil's "silver trumpet has disappeared and a manly strain is breathed through bronze."¹ Sedley's version, on the other hand, has a gently limpid flow which is far closer to the spirit of the original. Much of his success in this instance is certainly due to his bold use of the "overflowing" couplet instead of the strictly stopped form, which was becoming increasingly popular at the end of the seventeenth century; and though he does not always keep very close to the Latin, his diction is fresher and less conventional than that of his great rival. The picture of Cyrene² and her sister nymphs interrupted at their spinning by the complaint of Aristæus is rendered thus by Dryden:

"A mournful sound again the mother hears;
Again the mournful sound invades the sisters' ears.
Starting at once from their green seats they rise;
Fear in their heart, amazement in their eyes.
But Arethusa, leaping from her bed,
First lifts above the wave her beauteous head,
And crying from afar thus to Cyrene said:
'O sister, not with causeless fear possess'd!
No stranger voice disturbs thy tender breast.
'Tis Aristæus, 'tis thy darling son,
Who to his careless mother makes his moan,
Near his paternal stream he sadly stands,
With downcast eyes, wet cheeks, and folded hands,
Upbraiding heav'n from whence his lineage came;
And cruel calls the gods, and cruel thee by name."

¹ Sir C. Bowen, "Vergil in English Verse" (Preface, p. 7).

² "Georgics," IV. 349-56.

This is a fine exercise in the Augustan manner, but Sedley's version is much more—it is genuine poetry:

“The Nymph hears again
Nearer and nearer still her Son complain,
All rise astonisht from their green Abode;
But Arethusa first above the Flood
Lifts her bright Head: the Crystal Waters bow'd,
And spying him afar; 'Twas not in vain,
Sister, she said, we heard a Voice complain;
Sad Aristæus, once thy Care and Joy,
See at thy Father's Spring the weeping Boy:
By Name he calls thee Cruel and Unkind.”

Dryden expands Vergil's eight lines to fifteen, while Sedley's version occupies only nine and a half. The epithet “bright” is an infinitely better translation of “flavom” than Dryden's very insipid “beauteous,” and “thy Father's Spring” is good English and good sense, while “the paternal stream” is neither.

The translations from Martial among the “Court Characters” are admirably pointed and rank among the very best renderings of that poet's work into English verse. The following version of the forty-third Epigram of the second book is a good example of Sedley's felicitous rendering of Roman wit in terms of Restoration England:

“To Canidius

All Things are common among Friends, thou say'st;
This is thy Morning and thy Ev'ning-song,
Thou in Rich Point, and Indian Silk art dress'd,
Six foreign Steeds to thy Calash belong,
Whil'st by my cloaths the Ragman scarce wou'd gain,
And an uneasy Hackny jolts my Sides;
A Cloak embroider'd intercepts thy Rain,
A worsted Camblet my torn Breeches hides;
Turbots and Mullets thy large Dishes hold,
In mine a solitary Whiting lies;
Thy Train might Fire the impotent and old,
Whilst my poor Hand a Ganimede supplies.
For an old wanting Friend thou'lt nothing do, }
Yet all is common among Friends we know; }
Nothing so common, as to use 'em so.”¹

¹ “Miscellaneous Works” (1702), pp. 132, 133.

There is no reason to suppose that the author of such excellent translations as these should have been responsible for the inferior versions of the Eclogues of Vergil and Cicero's Oration for M. Marcellus included in the collected edition published in 1722. If they are his, they are probably schoolboy exercises, found among his papers, which he never intended to publish.¹

Three elegies from Ovid's "Amores," englished by Sedley, were published in Tonson's "Miscellany" of 1684.² For some reason or other they were never reprinted in any collected edition of his works. They are inferior in vigour and fire to Dryden's translations of Ovid in the same collection, but fully deserve the praise which Mr. Montague Summers has bestowed upon their "finish."³

Except for the letters and speeches already cited, Sedley's non-dramatic prose is of very slender dimensions. There is an "Essay on Entertainments," which was included by Captain Ayloffe in his edition of 1702 and is therefore almost certainly genuine. It is very archaic in structure and, like many of Bacon's essays, is a mere expansion of an apt quotation without any attempt at narrative or characterisation even in the way of anecdote. Such an essay is a good illustration of the magnitude of the revolution effected by the authors of the Tatler and Spectator. The matter of this little piece is curiously illustrative of Dryden's remarks on Sedley in the dedication of the "Assignment."⁴ Sir Charles was probably thinking of the "genial nights" which Dryden praised so highly when he wrote that the conversation at a party should be "of chearful and delightful Subjects, such as Beauty, ¹ See Preface to my forthcoming edition of Sedley's Works.

² Pp. 116, 122, 144. They are the eighth Elegy of the First Book, the fifth of the Second, and the fourth of the Third. See my forthcoming edition of Sedley's Works.

³ Introduction to Congreve's Works, Nonesuch Press, 1925, p. 61.

⁴ See above, pp. 93, 94.

Painting, Musick, Poetry, the Writers of the Past and Present Age; whereby we may at once improve and refresh our Wits." The paper entitled "Reflections on Our Past and Present Proceedings," published originally in 1689 and attributed to Sedley in the collected edition of 1722, is probably authentic, as it is attributed to him in a manuscript copy preserved in the Bodleian.¹ It deserves the praise given to its moderate views and "clear and facile style" by Sir A. W. Ward.² Another able and vigorous pamphlet, entitled "A Modest Plea for Some Excises at this Time," and dated 1694, exists in a contemporary transcript in the Bodleian³ and was never, apparently, printed. In this essay the Member for New Romney urges the Government of William III to raise money by means of excises instead of the land-tax—which was so bitterly resented by the squirearchy. It is curious to find the old courtier of the Restoration condemning the reign of Charles II as "luxurious and effeminate." His praise of the English landed gentry, who, he contends, were being crippled by the land-tax, as "of a free, open and generous temper" and "Famous for Hospitality in all ages," was certainly justified by the record of his own family.

Sir Charles Sedley's writings were only episodes in the crowded life of a courtier and a politician. But "Bellamira" and the best lyrics are sufficient to give him a place among the "little masters" of English literature, for whom there is ample room in halls so richly hung with works of high genius. And if literature is considered to be an interpretation of life, they are valuable as expressions of that vision of a world of wit and charm and distinction, which was as truly characteristic of the age as the sordid realities of street and tavern, and which was to find its most perfect expression in "The Way of the World" and "The Rape of the Lock."

¹ MS. Rawl., D. 924, 319. This transcript bears no date.

² D. N. B., s.a. "Sir Charles Sedley."

³ MS. Rawl., D. 380, 227. Another copy is calendared among the MSS. of the Marquis of Bath (Hist. MSS. Comm., Appendix to 3rd Report, p. 184).

APPENDIX I

DOCUMENTS ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF SIR CHARLES SEDLEY

- I. Letter of Lady Sedley, mother of Sir Charles Sedley, to Dudley Carleton, Viscount Dorchester.
- II. Letter of Sir A. Welldon to the Committee for Advance of Money concerning the Sedley Family.
- III. Siderfin's and Keble's Reports of Sir Charles Sedley's Trial and Minutes concerning the Fine in the State Papers.
- IV. Letter of Edward Coleman to the Internuntio, translated by Sedley.
- V. Rough Draft of a satirical poem on Sedley by Charles Montague.
- VI. Sir Charles Sedley's Will.
- VII. Oldys's and Haslewood's MS. Notes on Sedley.

I

LETTER OF LADY SEDLEY, MOTHER OF SIR CHARLES SEDLEY, TO DUDLEY CARLETON, VISCOUNT DOR- CHESTER

(State Papers Dom., Chas. I, 45, p. 22. 21 June, 1629.)

MY MOST HONORD LORD

at my last being in London my ill fortune denying me the injoyment of that happiness your Lo^p bestowed on me in your vissitts, I was bold to leve a sute to my Lady Barrington's delivery, who hath upon account of it, lett me in much arreridge of thanks for your noble inclination to give me satisfaction, and since you have seconded it by being pleased to remember it to Mr Sedley; at his waiteing on your Lo^p but seemed not then to know where I ment to end in my solicitation; which gives me now ocation to present it to your vew, my aime being only to recomend Mr Wright to your pleasure, so hee may be accounted by your Lo^p in the number of your servants. This is the uttermost of his ambition; and therefore of my sute, whatever more your Lo^p shall find him capable of; and imploy him in; must be your meere grace which I daresay shall be obeyed by a faithfull harte and received with all humility and now it becomes nessisary that I conclud with petition for pardon, for my thus longe troubling your L^p which I onely add the tender of my most affectionat service, which must ever bind me

Your L^{ops} humble devoted servant ELIZA SEDLEY.

Ailsford the 21 of June.

II

LETTER OF SIR A. WELLDON TO THE COMMITTEE FOR ADVANCE OF MONEY CONCERNING THE SEDLEY FAMILY

(State Papers Int., A. 90, f. 110. 3 July, 1645.)

NOBLE GENTLEMEN,

I receivd yr letter wch I sent to the Lady and shall first give you the answer the L^{dy} returnd to mee. that herself nor any of her servants evr received any tickett nor hath she or S^r W^m Sedley, Enhabited London or whin 20 myles since she acquitted herself by oath in Habberdashers Hall Therfor not taking any benifytt by dwelling in that house, w^{ch} made her liable before (beeing long time tennanted) she humbley conceves herself noe weye concernd by that order sent to mee, wh you very well apprehend to be noe waye preiudiciall to S^r W^m Sedley.

Butt ffor the estate, I shall (if th wer Just Cause) be ready, to make that appere, in a far worse condition then I presented unto you. that so plentiful a fortune brought by accident so lowe; that necessary payments swallows up; not only the wards estat and Ladyes Joynter, wh I believe is unprecedented through the kingdom. This I humbly give to your Consideration.

Yr most humble servant

ANTHONY WELLDON

Aylsford this third of July

III

DOCUMENTS CONNECTED WITH SIR CHARLES SEDLEY'S TRIAL AND FINE

(1) Extract from Siderfin's Reports (second edition, Mich., 15 Car. II, B.R.).

(Les Reports des Divers Specials Cases etc. Colligées par Tho. Siderfin Esq. La Second Edition: Revue & Corrigeé par Robert Dobyns Esq. . . . London MDCCXIV. I, 168.)

Le Roy versus Sr Charles Sidley.¹

Sr Ch. S. fuit indict al common Ley pur several Misdemeanors encounter Le Peace del Roy et que fueront al grand Scandal de Christianity, et le cause fuit quia il monstre son nude Corps in un Balcony in Covent Garden al grand Multitude de people et la fist tiel choses et parle tiel parolls &c (monstrant ascun particulars de son misbehavior) et cet Indictment fuit overtment lie a luy en
Court & fuit dit a luy per les Justices que coment la ne fuit a cel temps ascun
Star Chamber que cest Court Est

(29)
Fine &c sur
Indictm' pur Misdemeanors.

¹ Keb. 620.

¹ In the first edition (1683) "Sir Charles Sidney."

Custos Morum de tous les Subjects de Roy. Et est ore haut temps de Punnier tiels profane Actions fait encounter tout modesty queux sont cy frequentsicome nientsolement Christianity mes auxy morality ad eſtre derelinquy, Et apres que il ad ee continue in Court p recogn del Terme de Trin. al Terme de St Mich. Le Court luydemand daver son Triall pur cel al Barr, Mes il aiant advise submit luy mesme al Court et confesse L'indictment. Pur que le Court consider quel Judgment a doner. Et pur ceo q il fuit Gent home de trope aunc Family (ore del pays de Kent) et son Eſtate incumber (nient intendant son Ruine mes pur luy reforme) ils fine luy forsque 2000 Marks et que serra imprison pur un Weeke sans Baile et del bone porte pur 3 ans.

(Original in black letter except words here in italics.)

(2) Extraſt from Keble's Reports.

(Reports in the Court of the King's Bench at Westminster . . . taken by Jos Keble of Greys Inn Esq. The First Part London MDCLXXXV 4to.)

(95) Siderf. i. 168. pl. 29. Sir Charles Sydlyes Case ante

Peace He was Fined 2000 Mark, committed without Bail for a week, and Bound to his good behaviour for a year, on his Confession of Information against him, for shewing himself naked on a Balkony, and throwing down Bottles (piſt in) vi et armis among the people in Covent Garden contra pacem and to the Scandal of the Government.

(Original in black letter except words here in italics.)

(3) State Papers Dom., Chas. II. Ent. Bk. 16, p. 118.

Mr Hamilton to have Sir
Charles Sidley's fine.

Whereas upon informaçon exhibited in our Court of Kings Bench in Trinity term last against Sr Charles Sidley Bart for severall offences and misdemeanors therein expressed the sd Sr Charles was therefor ye same Terme by ye same Court fined ye sum of 1000 markes to be paid to us as by ye Record of ye sd Court may appear: our will and pleasure is that you forthwith prepare a Bill fit for Our Royall signature authorizing our trusty and well beloved Sr Thomas Fanshaw Knt Clerke of yr crowne to pay ye sd one thousand marks when ye same shall be paid to him unto our trusty and Well: George Hamilton Esq or his assign to be at his or their dispose

By his Majestyes &c Command.

HENRY BENNETT.

To our Attorney Generall.

(4) State Papers Dom., Chas. II. Docquet 67.

July 5th, 1664.

P.L.

Grant unto George Hamilton Esqe of the sum of 1000 marks which was a fine sett upon Sir Charles Sidley Baront by the Court of Kings Bench for severall Offences and misdemeanours by him lately remitted. Subscr. by Mr. Attorney generall, by a signification of his Maty pleasure undr his signe mannall, Procur. by Mr Secr. Bennett.

PHIL. WARWICK.

IV

(LETTER FOUND AMONG THE PAPERS OF EDWARD COLEMAN)

Seized on 29 September, 1678; translated by Sir Charles Sedley from the French and read to the House of Lords on 25 October, 1678; printed by Sir George Treby in "The Second Part of the Collection of Letters and other Writings, relating to the Horrid Popish Plott. Printed from the Originals, etc. . . . London, MDCLXXXI" (fol.), pp. 11 and 12.

Coleman to the Internuntio, July, 75.

SIR,

I cannot but let you know the part I take in the Honour the Pope has confer'd upon the Cardinal of Norfolk: for which I am sure he will ever acknowledg his obligation to the Emperour, and Mr Gabriel the Internuntio; Since 'tis only by them, and their Credit, that England is upheld at Rome: and 'tis in them that the Duke, and our Catholiques put all their Confidence. Therefore I think myself oblig'd to return you a Thousand Thanks for the part you have taken in the Affair of the Cardinal of Norfolk: and to Acknowledg you the Author of a Benefit so Advantageous for England, and to expect good success from the Prosperous beginning. Our Affairs are at present in a very ill posture; and that which yet makes 'um worse, is that the Duke's Friends have contributed to it in a great measure, by accident, and for want of foreseeing that which was Visible enough: making use of a little Courage instead of a base and servile compliance: but by their assistance the great manager of our money¹ is so exalted, that he is the only person who has at this time any Credit with the King: and being got to this height is resolved to establish himself upon the Authority of Parliament, and the Credit of the Religion of England; & by that means to ruine the Catholicks & the Duke: and to play the same Game that my Lord Arlington propos'd to himself, when he had more power than he has at present. We have but one Remedy for all these Mischiefs we foresee: which is to Distract the Parliament to that Degree that they shall never agree among themselves; so that they shall be altogether useless to the King; and by that means he will be forc'd to lay them aside: this is the only thing we have at present any hope in: Perhaps with much difficulty, we may be so happy as to succeed in it. But that we may be more capable of serving You, we desire your holy Prayers for the Duke, and for the Catholiques: and for him, who scarce deserves your remembrance, being but an inconsiderable Wretch, although he be with more Respect and Passion, than any man living,

¹ This probably refers to Danby, the Lord Treasurer.

Yours,

I have sent every Post all our News by our Common Friend.

Translated by Sir Charles Sedley.

V

DRAFT OF A SATIRE ON SIR CHARLES SEDLEY IN HAND-WRITING OF CHARLES MONTAGUE, AFTERWARDS
EARL OF HALIFAX.

(Brit. Mus., Add. MSS. 28, 644, p. 57*b*.)

| | |
|--|-----|
| Go let the fatted Calf a Victim burn | (1) |
| loose | |
| For Sidley's the [lost] Prodigals return | |
| Sidley the Bold, the witty and the gay | |

Whose tongue has led
 [That has seduced] so many Maids a stray
 Has laid aside the Vices of the Lay (5)
 And in the Arms of Mother Church at last
 More than atones for All his wandrings past

Whynyard
 [Rises her Champion and his Weapon draws] support

[In the defence of her most doubtfull cause]
 Knight

Prodigious Man that among Husks and swine (10)
Couldst learn the Mysterys of y^e sacred Trine

Could fathom mysterys and turn Divine
 2 [And in the sacred Trinitys Defence]
 [Defys at Arms Reason and Common sense]

1 Has drawn his Pen and thrown his Gantlet down
 To his forsaken Bretheren of the Town (16)
 To all that dare the Trinity disown
 the mystick Trinitys

And in [that Doctrines wonderfull] defense
 Boldly defyes Reason and Common sense
 1 Commence a Doctor reeking from ye stews (20)
 The Apostolick Bard of Mother Hewes

gy
 As antient Knights who has huge Giants slain
 And mow'd down Sarrasens on Pagan plains
 To crown the Labours of their murdering Trade Did Offer up their spurs and trusty blade (25)
 valiant

So our Great Sidley who has triumphed long us our

Kil'd [men] wth Satyr and [their] wives wth Song
 Hew'd down the Monstrous Fopperys of men
 On the High Altar Dedicates his Pen
 Dos Club his Talent to the Churches stock (30)
 And in the Quire displays the Comick sock
 What Anthems and w^t Hymns will now be heard
 When Organs are inspired by such a Bard

Assume

Devotion will [receive] another Air
 When Sidleys gentle muse dos pen a Prayer (35) pretty

 And wth [sweet] smiles our spirits chear this

2 Who dost [a] Mission wonderfull professe
 (Like Antient Prophets) in a savage dresse
 3 And so Display the Compass of thy wit
 Joinst Hymns with Baudy Farce and sacred Writ (40)
 3 And pretty Similes sprinkled here and there Wt Quicken our flagging zeal like Botled Beer heightened by his

1 Ejaculations will become thy stile will in

And pious Brethings in such Numbers smile
 [Go on great S^r the Churches Banner raise] (45)
 [And Teach the Wits and Athiests pious Lays]
 [And make them leave their nauseus songs and plays]
 Brave

Go on Great S^r w^t Hopkins could not reach
 Nor Quarles attain, thy greater Muse shall teach Railleurs

Subdue the Wits and Athiests of the Age (50)
 And fix the Churches standard on y^e Stage
 Oh! Dog and Partridge thou hast cause to mourn
 Thy Darling Son is from thy Bosom torn
 Sidley is gone and never will return
 Prophanesse cannot stand w out thy Aid (55)

none can support

Withdraw thy stock and they must quit the Trade
 [Lesse they affliction was, more mild]
 [Lesse were thy joys and expectations crost]
 [In Strephons Death, then now when Sidleys lost]

again

Sidley He started once and did return [to you] (60)
 with his own pen
 But now his ears are bored [He must be true]

When the Old Tennis Court fell on his back
 Tho his soul flutter'd and the Goose cryed Quak
 Devotion by Compulsion is but short
 But this Relapse is of another sort (65)
 As to Damascus rid the Elective Knight
 (In Kentish Dialect 'tis Rumey height)
 He saw wth wonder in that thieving Town
 How they can squeeze three fleeces into One
 To
 [And] make them pass the Custom house for none (70)
 This Contemplation did his soul surprise
 And [thick] black scales fell from his enlightened eyes
 my dull
 And w^t, said He, shall [saucy] Reason doubt these rogues
 That in Religion, w^{ch} my friends make out [May there not be three Persons in one God] (75) se w^h compound [constitute] the
 As here there are three fleeces in a Tod
 2 Are of like
 Of equal weight of the same thred and wool
 Three Fleeces are one Tod the Proof is full [Can] Can Mystick Truths convincing Reasons lack w^{ch}
 When Lo the fleeces [that] compound y^e pack (80)
 His Faith [from]
 From this strange Vision [did] did proceed
 Hence date the Hurika of Sidleys Creed
 Who tho a Reprobate before, a very Saul Shall after, this Conversion, be S^r Paul. (84)

N.B.—Words and whole verses crossed out in Montague's MS. are here enclosed in square brackets.
 The numbering of the lines is mine.

VI

SIR CHARLES SEDLEY'S WILL

PREROGATIVE COURT OF CANTERBURY

118 DYER

Tm
Dni Caroli
Sedley
Bar^{ti}

I Sr Charles Sedley of Southfleete in the County of Kent Baronett being in good health of body and of perfect mind and memory doe make this my last Will and Testament as followeth Whereas after the Settlement which I formerly made of certaine of my Mannors and Lands of Inheritance upon or in consideration of the marryage of Sr Charles Sedley of the parish of St. Giles in the ffeilds in the County of Middx Knight with a Daughter of Sr Richard Newdigate I have by severall Indentures beareing date respectively the twelfth and thirteenth dayes of September in the yeare of our Lord one thousand six hundred ninety nine by certaine whereof such provision is made for the payment of my funerall charges without limitting any particular sume of money to be expended or not to be exceeded therein together with such provision for the payment of such my debts and in such manner as are for those purposes therein contained settled the rest of my Mannors and Lands of Inheritance and some Leasehold estate respectively I doe by this my will declare that I have not altered or revoked the same deeds or Settlements therein contained nor doe intend any revocation or alteration hereby to be made thereof But doe by this my Will confirme the same And I doe alsoe by this my will confirm the Settlement made by one Indenture beareing date the six and twentyeth day of November in the yeare of our Lord one thousand six hundred eighty seaven of my interest in the House where I now dwell scituate in Bloomesbury Square in the said Parish of St. Giles in the ffeilds And whereas by one Deed Poll beareing date the nine and twentyeth day of Aprill in the said yeare of our Lord one thousand six hundred ninety nine I did assigne and dispose of certaine Jewells Plate and Goods therein mencōned in such manner as is therein contained And afterwards by one other Deed Poll beareing date the eleaventh day of September in the said yeare of our Lord one thousand six hundred ninety nine the said Jewells and part of the said plate and goods were soe assigned and disposed of as therein is contained I doe by this my Will confirm the said last menconed Deed Poll and the said assignment [sic] and disposicon of the said Jewells and part of the said plate and goods thereby and alsoe the assignment and disposition of the residue of the said plate and goods made by the said other Deed Poll beareing date the said nine and twentyeth day of Aprill in the said yeare of our Lord one thousand six hundred ninety nine And I referr my decent buryall to the discretion of my Executors herein after named And I doe hereby give and bequeath unto such of my servants as shall have lived with me twelve moneths imediately before my death ffive pounds apiece for mourning And my Will is and I order that my ffamily shall be kept together at my dwelling house in such manner as now it is for one callander moneth after my death and that my Executors defray all the charge of such house keeping during that time And

I doe hereby nominate and appoint the afore-said Sr Charles Sedley Knt Edward Bedingfeild of Grayes Inn in the County of Middx Esq^r and Stoughton Bird of the parish of St. Andrew Holbourne in the County of Middx gent. Executors of this my last Will and Testament And I give unto my said Executors for their trouble and care in the executiōn of this my Will ffifty pounds apiece to be paid unto them respectively as soone as conveniently may be after their respective proving of this my Will and takeing upon them respectively the burthen of the execution thereof And I give unto the said Sr Charles Sedley Knt all the residue and overplus if any shall be of my personall estate not otherwise settled or disposed of by any of the afore-said Deeds that shall remaine after that the rest of this my Will shall be performed And I revoke all former Wills whatsoever by me heretofore made In witness whereof I the said Sr Charles Sedley Baronett have to this my last Will and Testament sett my hand and seale this (blank) day of (blank) in the thirteenth yeare of the reigne of his Majestie King William the Third over England &c. Anno Domini One thousand seaven hundred and one. Charles Sedley. Signed sealed published and declared by the above named Sr Charles Sedley Baronett to be his last Will and testam^t in the presence of us Mary Townshend Ed. Leigh John Thorold.

Probatum fuit huīmoi Testamentum apud Londōn coram vēiti viro Willimo Clements Legum Doctore Surrogato ventis et egregii viri Domini Richardi Raines Militis Legum etiam Doctoris Curiae Praerogativae Cantuariensis Mağri Cuſtodis ſive Comiſſarii ĩtime conſtituti Triceſimo die menſis Auguſti Anno Domini Millimo Septingenmo primo jura-mento Stoughton Bird unius Executorum in eodem Teſtamento nominat. Cui cõmiſſa fuit Adm̃ſtraço omniũ et ſingulorum bonorum jurium et creditorum dicti defuncti de bene et fideliter adm̃ſtrando eadem ad Sancta Dei Evangelia Jurať Reſervata poteſtate ſimilem Comnem faciend Edvardo Bedingfeild arm̃ alteri Executorum in eodem Teſtamento nomi-nat cum venerit eandem petitur. Domino Carolo Sedley Milite altero Execũt in dicto Teſtamento nominať demortuo.

VII

MS. NOTES ON SEDLEY BY W. OLDYS AND J. HASLEWOOD
(The numbering of the notes is mine.)

1. W. Oldys's Notes on the article on "Sir Charles Sidley" in "An Account of the English Dramatick Poets . . . by Gerard Langbaine . . . Oxford . . . 1691" (Brit. Mus., c. 28, g. 1), pp. 485-6.

- (1) S^r Charles was an handsome plump middle sized man There was a great Resemblance in the Shape and Features between him and Kynaſton the Actor who once got some Lac'd clothes made exactly after a ſuit Sir Charles wore who therefore got him well can'd Sir Charles his Emiſſary pretending to take Kynaſton for S^r Charles quareld with him in St James's Park for ſome private Miſuſage and beat him as S^r Charles.
- (2) S^r Charles Sedley had a daughter named Katharine by his wife Katherine and a natural son named Charles Sedley alias Ascough and two natural daughters named L. and E. Charlot. Upon these natural children he settled a part of his Estate in Kent Essex etc. I have a copy of the Deed of settlement drawn by Sr Fras Winnington and approved by Holt and Pollexfen.

- (3) Remr the sharp saying about King James his making his Da^r a whore and he making the King's daughter a Queen, in my vol. of apoth:
- (4) He was a man of Wit and Pleasure, but too much given up to the extravagances and Debaucheries w^{ch} were so fashionable among the other Wits of Fortune and Quality in those Times.
- (5) Remembr ye shameful shitten story that Ant. Wood has recorded of him in the silly account he has given of his own life which is worse written than any of the many hundreds as he had a hand in.
- (6) Remr the Frolick that old Mrs Partridge told 40 years ago, of his companions when they saw him with a very valuable lac'd neck loth on, which by every one's toasting a Health and leaving some part of their Apparel he was in his turn obligd to sacrifice to the Flames. In revenge for wch he had his Frolick at another Meeting, and by his previous Instructions of a Tooth drawer for that purpose made everyone of that Company not without Tears from their Eyes and oaths enough frō their mouths before the Frolick was over lose a sound Tooth, for a painful rotten one he wanted to get rid of—Patience, Gentlemen, Patience, you know—you promised I should have my Frolick too.
- (7) 4 years after, the Mulberry garden in St.

Martins Parish was given by the King to Hen: L^d Arlington.

- (8) Sr Charles Sidley's speech in the House of Commons upon the Civil List, against exorbitant Pensions and Unnecessary Salaries—in the collection of scarce & valuable Tracts &c in 4 vols. vol. 2. 1748, p. 487.

Further note from Oldys's Langbaine opposite the article on Shadwell, p. 443.

- (9) I have heard that Dorset, Sedley and others of those idle Wits would write whole Scenes for him.

2. MS. Notes by J. Haslewood on the article on "Sir Charles Sidley" in "The Poetical Register or the Lives and Characters of all the English Poets [by Giles Jacob] . . . London . . . 1723" (Brit. Mus. c. 45, d. 17), pp. 242-3.

- (1) Malone cites authorities for Sidley. See "Life of Dryden," Vol. I. pp. 65-7. I have seen two original autographs of the poet and several of his descendants, and they wrote their names indisputably Sedley.
- (2) In all the old Deeds from the time of Charles the 1st. the name is uniformly spelt Sedley. Himself and ancestors resided at Southfleet co: Kent and he is supposed to have died there. The family estates were extensive. In Kent Southfleet, Northfleet, Ridley, Hartley, Gt. Oakley, Honeychild, Triston, Wormshill, Muttenden, Milton Mills, Alisford Mill, Boxley Woods, Impton Woods, Plushenden, Marsdens. In Leicest. Wymondham & Dalby. In Camb. Stretham. In Oxford Winbush.
- (3) In 1718 there were mortgages of Sir C. S. the poet outstanding for 1300£, 1000£ and 4000*l* and Estates appear to have been subject to other Debts contracted by him.

- (4) Sir C. S. of Oxton Co. Nottingham Bt. only son, Heir of Sir C. S. of the par. of St Giles and grandson of the poet sold under a Decree of the Court of Chan. part of the Estates in order to clear the incumbrances in July 1721.
- (5) In "Some Account of the Life of Sir Charles Sedley" before his works in Octavo (1722 I copy from) is the following story: "It was at the acting of the play call'd Bellamira, that the roof of the playhouse fell down. But what was particular, was that very few were hurt but himself. His merry Friend Sir Fleetwood Shepherd told him: There was so much fire in his play that it blew up the poet, House, and all. He told him again, NO: the play was so Heavy that it broke down the House and buried the Poet in his own Rubbish." This story there can be very little doubt grew out of the accident that happened to Sir Charles in 1679/80, when he was hurt severely by the fall of the Tennis Court, and where "being at play" has no reference to the play of Bellamira which appears to have been first acted and printed in 1687.
- (6) Sir John Sedley (father of the poet) by his Will dated the 5th Oct. 1637, gave his Manors in trust to his wife Lady Eliz., Sir Edw. Hales Kn^t. B^t., Sir Anthony Weldon Kn^t, Anthony Crofts and Anthony Langston 1st for Henry Sedley on attaining age of 23 and in case of death 2^d to Willm S. like limitation, 3^d to the third son lawfully to be begotten, (therefore the poet was not then born) 4 to his daurs, Eliz., Marg^t on marriage or attaining 17—gave his daughter Elizabeth 5000£, William 12000£, Margaret 2500£ such child as his wife sho^d be ensient with at the time of his death 2500£. Residue of psonal est. to Henry.

He devised 400£ of his personal estate to be laid out in purchase of Lands to be settled for the maintenance of a Schoolmaster in the par. of Wymondham, Leicest/shire, 400£ for like purposes at Southfleet in Kent. 500£ for better maintenance of scholars of Moreton [sic] Coll. Ox. called postmasters.

500£ like purpose scholars of Magdalen Coll. Ox. called Domies [sic] for ever.

- (7) Time of death of Sir John Sedley not known, probably immly after making his will & his wife then encient with Charles.
- (8) Henry the son appears to have died a Minor.
- (9) Sir Willm was in posson in 1655 and Sir Charles as his brother, heir at law in Jan. 1663. Sir Willm appears to have died without issue and probably unmarried as a deed of appointment in 1655 limits to his first and other sons but does not name any, nor mention any Wife.
- (10) By Mortgage dated 21st June 1675 Sir Charles raised 4120£ which was only paid off in July 1721 when it vested in William Peer Williams, the reporter.
- (11) 1699. Sep. 13. by Settlement of this date Sir Cha. S. limited his Estates in Kent first to himself, 2^d to the use of Ann Ayscough one of the daurs of Henry Ayscough late of Gray's Inn Middx Gent decd, 3^d to the use to Sir Charles S. of the par. of S. Giles in the Fields Middx Knt. 4th to the Issue of Sir C. S. knt. 5th to the use of the Rt hono^{ble} Katherine Countess of Dorchester for life 6th to her Issue lawfully begotten for default of such Issue 7th to the use of Sir Charles of St. Clare in the Co. of Kent B^t 8th to his issue Q how related?

- (12) The object of this settlement is not easily elicited by anything upon the face of the deed unless it was to give a life estate to Ann Ayscough who probably might be living with the poet and might have some claim on his generosity. She died at York 1765.¹ One provisoe in the Deed may be noticed which is that if the Countess of Dorchester or any present or future husband or their issue should attempt to avoid, annul impeach etc. that settlement all the uses limited to them should determine and be void.
- (13) Sir Charles S. knt. marr. Frances and had issue Anne who had a charge created in her favour on the estates of 3000£.
- (14) This Sir C. S. knt was the son of poet. His marr. settlement dated 29th June, 1697. His wife Frances probably a dau^r of Sir Richd Newdigate party to the settlement.

¹ This is a mistake, see p. 234.

APPENDIX II

A NOTE ON SIR CHARLES SEDLEY'S LIBRARY

SIR CHARLES SEDLEY'S boast to the Judge that he had read more books than his Lordship is justified to some extent by a catalogue of part of his library, a copy of which survives in the British Museum. The full title of this remarkable document is as follows:—

A/ Catalogue/ of the/ Books/ of Sir Charles Sidley, B^{nt} Dec./ with the Addition of part of a Library of a Late/ Eminent Divine./ To be/ Sold by Auction at Tom's/ Coffee-House adjoining to Ludgate; On/ Wednesday the 23rd of March 1702/3. At/ Four of the Clock in the Afternoon./ Catalogues are Distributed Gratis, at/ Mr Hartley's over against Grey's Inn in/ Holborn, Mr Brown's at the Black Swan/ without Temple Bar, Mr. Davis's over a-/ gainst the Royal-Exchange in Cornhill, Mr/ Clement's in Oxon, and Mr Thurlburn's in/ Cambridge, and at the place of Sale. (Brit. Mus., S.C. 389(1).)

It might be supposed that the task of separating the books of the "Eminent Divine" from those of Sir Charles Sedley would not be a difficult one. As a matter of fact there are some tastes which they might well have had in common. Both would probably possess the chief Latin and perhaps some of the Greek classical authors; both might have collected works on the history and antiquities of Oxford, and both might have taken some interest in contemporary philosophy. On the other hand, we can be fairly sure that all the numerous theological works in the catalogue were not from Sedley's library (though he may have acquired some at the time of his "conversion"), and that most of the contemporary verse, light French and English literature and works on the theatre, was not the property of the Eminent Divine. The following list is a selection from the catalogue containing some of the books which I consider may have been Sedley's. The numbers on the left are the numbers printed in the catalogue; the figures on the right are the prices fetched by some of the books, which are written in ink in the British Museum copy.

Libri Latini, Gr. &c. in Folio.

| | | £ | s. | d. |
|------|--|---|----|----|
| 89. | Livii Tit. Opera Basil 1543 . | | 3 | 2 |
| 90. | Virgilij Opera Joh. Ogilvy Lat. Impft. Lond. 1658 . . | | 6 | 0 |
| 93. | Virgilij Opera Servij notis Joh. Petit | | 3 | 0 |
| 98. | Mercatori Atlas cum Tabulis . | | 2 | 6 |
| 128. | Rerum Anglic. Scriptores post Bedam editi ab H. Savilio Lon. 1596 | 1 | 1 | 0 |
| 135. | Marmora Oxoniensia cum Com. H. Prideaux & fig. Oxon. 1676 . | | 14 | 0 |
| 136. | Historia et Antiquitates Universi- tatis Oxoniensis Oxon. 1674 . | | 12 | 6 |
| 149. | Juvenalis D. Satyrae Loover 1644 | | | |
| 150. | Terentij Comediae Paris Typog. Regia 1642 | | | |
| 151. | Homeri Castalio Bas. 1567 | | | |
| 152. | Plutarchi quae Extant Omnia, Gr. Lat. 2 Vol. Frances. 1650 . | 1 | 2 | 6 |
| 159. | Gassendus de Vita, Morib. Placi- tisq; Epicuri Lugd. 1675 . | | 5 | 0 |
| 160. | Epicuri Philosophia par Pet. Gas- sendum, 3 vols. | | 6 | 0 |

| | | |
|---------------------------|---|----------------|
| Sir Charles Sedley | | 326 |
| 161. | Catalogus Bibliothecae Bodleianae à Tho Hyde. Oxon. 1674 | £ s. d. 5 2 |
| 162. | Senecae L. An. Opera cum scholij Fed. Morelli Paris 1613 | 7 6 |
| 174. | Gratulatio Academ. Cantabrig. de Reditu R. Guil. III. 1697 Cantab. | |
| 175. | Pietas Universit. Oxoniensis in Obitum Reginae Mariae 1695. | |

Libri Latini, Quarto.

| | | |
|------|---|-------|
| 48. | Lucret. T. Car. cum Dion. Lambini Com. apud Benenat 1570 | 13 6 |
| 58. | Spinozae Opera Posthuma 1677 | } 7 4 |
| 59. | —— Tractatus Theologico Politicus Ham. 1670 | |
| 63. | Oxford Catalogue Oxon. 1620 | |
| 73. | Des Cartes Ren. Principia Philosophiae Amst. 1664 | 3 0 |
| 84. | Sinibaldi Jo. Den. Geneanthropia sive de Hominis Generat. Franc. | 2 6 |
| 99. | Juvenalis D. Jun. Satyrae Paris 1635 | |
| 103. | Suetonius cum Notis Casauboni 1611 | 1 6 |
| 104. | Stephani Car. Dict. Hist. Geog. & Poet. Gen. 1660 | 9 6 |
| 225 | Socratis &c. Epistolae Gr. Lat. Not. L. Allatij Paris 1637 | 3 6 |
| 226 | Adagia Graecorum Gr. Lat. cum Schol. And. Schotti Ant. 1612. | 4 4 |
| 227. | Pindarus Gr. & Lat. cum Notis J. Benedicti Salm. 1620 | 6 10 |
| 228. | Sophoclis Tragediae cum. Scol. Gr. & Not. Camerarij H. Steph. 1565 | |

Libri Latini in Octavo.

| | | £ | s. | d. |
|------|--|---|----|----|
| 3. | Plutarch de Audientis Poetis Gr. Lat. &c. cum. Not. Jo. Potter Oxon. | | 1 | 3 |
| 46. | Lucretius T. cum notis Tho. Creech Oxon. 1695 | | 3 | 2 |
| 53. | Plauti Comediae cum Notis J. Phil. Parei Franc. 1610 | | | 8 |
| 58. | Luciani Pseudo Sophista Gr. Lat. cum Nots. J. Geo. Graevij Amst. 1668 | | 3 | 0 |
| 81. | Terentij P. Comediae Anglo a G. Heel London 1676 | | 1 | 8 |
| 119. | Heliodori Aethiopica Gr. Lat. cum. H. Commelini Notis Lugd. 1612 | | | |
| 135. | Theophrasti Eth. Character Gr. Lat. Notis Is. Casauboni Lugd. 1612 | | | |
| 142. | Luciani Opera Gr. Lat. cum Varier Notis Alex. Tollij Tom 1 Amst. 1670 | | | |
| 144. | Gassendi Pet. Institutio Astronomica Lond. 1675 | | | |
| 146. | Nebulo Nebulonum L. E. Jocoseria modernae censura cum figur. & carm. à Jo. Flitnero Franc. 1620 | | | |
| 148. | Aristotelis Ethica Gr. Lat. à D. Lambino 1596 | | | |
| 149. | Horatius Q. cum. Interpret et Not. in usum Delph. Lond. 1675 | | | |
| 150. | Apuleij Opera 2 vol. Bas. | | | |
| 167. | Breviarum Romanum | | | |
| 170. | Camdeni Britannia | | | |
| 177. | Erasmi Adag. Epitap. | | | |
| 191. | Horatius Stephanus | | | |
| 193. | Horatius | | | |
| 235. | Terentius Donatus | | | |
| 236. | Plutarchi Morales 3 vol. | | | |
| 237. | —— Vitae 2 vol. | | | |

120 £c. in Gr. & Lat. £c.

| | | £ | s. | d. |
|------|---|---|----|----|
| 2. | Erasmi Desid. Apothegma . . . | | | 6 |
| 17. | Miltonij pro Populo Angl. Def. . | | | 7 |
| 22. | Literae Cromwellij &c. Scripta a Jo. Miltono. | | | 4 |
| 34. | Epistolae Obscuror. Virorum . | I | | 6 |
| 38. | Terentij Comaed. sine Tit ap. Elz. | | | 8 |
| 49. | Terentius cum not. J. Farnabij. . | | | 8 |
| 54. | Oweni Epigrammata | | | |
| 66. | Thesaurus Poeticus | | | |
| 67. | Statuta Oxonienses | | | |
| 68. | Sheltoni Tachy-Graphia | | | |
| 70. | Roma Illustrata | | | |
| 87. | Homeri Odyssea 2 vol. | | | |
| 90. | Des Cartes Ethices. | | | |
| 115. | Erasmi Epit. | | | |
| 116. | Erasmi Enconium. | | | |
| 120. | Machiaveli. Hist. Forent. | | | |
| 121. | Mori Utopia | | | |
| 122. | Luciani Dialogi | | | |
| 125. | Martialis Epigram. | | | |
| 129. | Mantuan | | | |
| 130. | Plautus | | | |
| 140. | Tullij Orat. | | | |
| 142. | Tullij Sentent. | | | |
| 142. | Virgilij Opera | | | |
| 155. | Plautus | | | |
| 158. | Martial Farnabij | | | |
| 161. | Luciani Dialog. | | | |
| 163. | Ciceron M.T. Opera edit. à Jac. Gronovio 11 vol. | I | 6 | 6 |
| 166. | Adagior Erasmi Epitome . . . | | | 10 |
| 171. | Lucani Pharsalia | | | 4 |

English Books in Folio.

45. Sir Tho. More's Works 2 vols.
46. Heylin's Cosmography with Maps, 1669.
47. Burnet's Theory of the Earth, 1684.
50. Raleigh's Hist. of the World with his Life and Tryal. 1687.
55. Ogilby's Virgil. 1668
56. ——— Homer's Iliads. 1669
57. ——— Homer's Odysseys 1669
58. Dugdale's Baronage of England 2 vol. 1675
59. Mille's Catalogue of Honour. 1610
60. Bacon Of the Laws and Government of England 1689.
61. Davila's Hist. of the Civil Wars of France, 1678.
62. Dodington's Hist. of the Civil Wars of France, 1657.
64. Nero Caesar. 1623.
67. History of Portugal, 1700.
69. Guiccardini's Hist. of Italy, 1579.
70. Athenae Oxonienses 2 vols. 1691.
71. Bacon's Advancement of Learning Ox. 1640.
74. Chardin's Travels into Persia and East-Indies with Fig. 1691.
75. Pembrok's Arcadia 1627.
78. Bochas's Tragedies, Black Letter.
79. Exemplary Novels by Mic. Cervantes Saavedra. 1640.
81. Stafford's Pacata Hibernia with maps Lond. 1633.
82. Military Inst. for the Cavalry Camb. 1632.
83. Corn. Tacitus Annals 1622.
86. Dryden's Juvenal Lond. 1693.
91. Devotions of his Majesty in his Solitudes, in Verse. 1657.
97. Works of Joh. Taylor the Water Poet (wants the Title).

98. Torriano's Ital. and English Dictionary, etc.
Lond. 1698.
99. The Young Student's Library 1692.
101. Sidney concerning Government, Lond. 1698.
102. Stowe's Survey of London, 1633.
103. Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, 1676.
104. Morery's Historic. Geographic. and Poetic.
History 1694.
105. The Grand Cyrus 5 vols. 1655.

English Quartos.

1. Milton's Eiconoclastes Lond. 1649.
5. Lock's 3 Letters of Toleration 1690.
10. Whole Art of the Stage, 1684.
18. Terence in English and Latin 1629.
38. Earl of Clarendon's Survey of Hobb's Leviathan
Ox. 1676.
45. Tryal of the Regicides, 1660.
85. Raleigh of the Prerogative of Parliaments, 1628.
97. Swinburn of Testaments and last Wills, 1590.
99. Donn's Poems, 1633.

English Octavos.

1. Glanvil of Witches and Apparitions Lond.
1681.
2. Sharp's Voyages and Adventures into the South Sea 1684.
4. Gildon's Miscellany Letters and Essays, 1694.
5. Theocritus's Idylliums by Tho. Creech Oxf.
1684.
7. Poems and Translations by Oxford Hands.
1685.
11. Kennet's Lives of the Ancient Greek Poets, 1697.
13. Dryden's 3d part of Miscellany Poems, 1693.
14. Sir Rob. Cotton's Posthuma, 1672.

19. Essay on Ways and Means of Supplying the War, 1695.
20. Debates of the House of Commons in 1680.
21. Debates 1680.
23. Casaubon of Enthusiasm Lond. 1656.
29. Playford's Introduction to Musick, 1697.
30. Evremont's Miscellaneous Essays, 1692.
31. Debates, 1680.
33. Donn's Poeme.
57. Godolphin of the Admiralty.
82. Rolle's Burning of London.
83. Wilkins of Prayer.
90. Dr. Bentley against Boyle, Lond. 1699.
91. Wilkin's Beauty of Providence.
92. Answer to Rehearsal transpos'd.
97. Lock's Letter to the B^p of Worcester, Lond. 1697.
98. ——— Reply to B^p of Worcester's Answer, 1697.
99. ——— Reply to the B^p of Worcester's Ans. to his 2nd Letter, 1699.
101. Vind. Reasonableness of Christianity, 1695.
102. ——— 2nd Vindicat. of the Reasonabl. of Christianity, 1696.
103. Kath. Philip's Poems, 1664.
104. Boyle against Bently's Dissertat. on the Epist. of Phalaris. 1698.
105. Sir R. Filmer's Natural Power of Kings, 1680.
107. Bond's Guide for Justices of the Peace, Lond. 1685.
110. Hobb's State of Nature consider'd by J. Eachard 1672.
112. Milton's Paradise Lost, 1678.
113. Smith's Fr. Ital. Span. and Eng. Grammar, 1674.
115. Collier's Defence of his View of the Stage, 1699.
122. Culpepper's Directory for Midwives, with Cuts Lond. 1681.

124. Sir W. Dugdale's usage in bearing Arms Oxf.
1682.
134. Montaigne's Essays, by Cotton. Vol. 3d.
1685.
136. Gildon's new Collections of Poems Lond.
1701.
137. Capt. Dampier's Voyages and Descript. Voll.
2d. 1699.
138. Sir Jo. Denham's Poem of Old Age, 1689.
139. Lucretius with Notes by Thomas Creech.
Lond. 1683.

English Twelves.

1. Walker's English and Latin Idioms. Lond.
1690.
2. Lilly's Royal Grammer, made plain 1678.
3. The Refin'd Courtier, 1679.
4. Reflect. on the Secret Hist. of K. Ch. II and
K. James 2d. 1691.
7. The Lady's New-Year's Gift, 1688.

Livres Francois en Folio.

3. Histoire Universelle du Sr. D'Aubigne. 3 vols. en 2 Tom à Maille. 1616.
4. Dictionnaire Etymologique de la Langue Fran-coise par M. Menage Par. 1694.
6. Les Metamorphoses D'Ovide enrichies de Figures Par. 1622.
7. James Howell's French and English Dictionary
Lond. 1673.

L. Francois en Quarto.

3. Les Recherches de la France d'Est. Pasquier.
1607.
4. Les Voyages du Sr. de la Bovelie-le-Gouz. avec fig. Troyes. 1657.

7. Antiquitez de Paris, Par Jacques du Brevi.
Par. 1639.
11. Voyage de Franc. Pyrard Delaval. Par. 1679.
12. Traitez conclus entre les Potentats de l'Europe 1683.
13. Recueil de Edits &c. du Roy. Par. 1673.
14. Ordonnonance de Louis XIV Roy de France
touchant la Marine. Par. 1681.
15. Confernces des Nouvelles Ordonances de
Louis XIV avec des Annot. par Phil Bernier.
2 vols. Par. 1694.
16. Tachart Dict. Nov. Lat. Latine-Gall. et Gall.
Lat. 2 vols. Par. 1698.

L. Francois en 8°.

2. Les 6 Comedies de Terence en Lat. & Franc.
par M. de Marolles avec des Remarques
Par. 1660.
3. De la Sagesse par P. Charron, Par. 1607.
4. Claude Mauger's French Grammer Lond.
1688.
5. Nouvelle Grammaire Francoise par P. Festeau,
Lond. 1679.
8. Du Royaume de Siam par M. de la Loubere—
Tom 1, Amst. 1691.
9. Parallele des Anciens & de Modernes par M.
Perault Tom 2d. Par. 1693.
11. Les Caracteres de Theophraste traduits par
M. de la Bruiere Bruxel. 1693.
12. Histoires de Indes Occidentales, Par. 1569.
14. La Galatee & les Adventures du Prince Astiages, Par. 1626.
15. Crispin bel Esprit Comedie, Par. 1682.
16. Grammaire pour Scavoir la prononciation de Langue Espagnole. Rouen, 1636.
17. Cronique du Roy Loys II &c. par Ph. de Comines.
18. Mauger's French Grammar, Lond. 1682.

L. Francois en 12°.

1. Histoire du Gouvernement de Venise Par le
Sr. Am. de la Houssaie avec des Figures,
3 Vols. Amst. 1695.
2. — des Anabatistes avec des Figures Par.
1695.
3. — de la Medecine Gen. 1696.
4. — de P. d'Aubusson Grand-Maître de
Rhodes, 2 vol. Par. 1676.
5. — Poetique entres les Anciens & Modernes, Amst. 1688.
6. — de France par le Sr. de Bonair, Par. 1682.
8. — des 12 Cesars par Suetone et traduite par M. de Teil. Lion. 1685.
9. Les Oeuvres de Lucrece avec de Remarques Par M. le Barn de Coutures. 2 vols. Par.
1692.
10. — D'Horace en Lat. et Franc. Tom 1,
2; 4 Par. 1681.
11. Melange D'Histoire & de Litterature Par. M.
de Vigreu Marville. Tom 1. Rouen. 1700.
12. Sentiments de Clearte sur les Entetret. d'Ariste et Eugene, Partie 2d. Par. 1672.
13. Comedie de Terence en Lat. & Franc. avec des Notes Par. 1672.
14. Traduites par Madam D. Tom 1, Amst. 1691.
18. Ouvres de Racine Tom 2. 1682.
20. Le Poetique D'Aristote avec des Remarques par Mrs. Dacier, Par. 1692.
22. Du Poeme Epique par le P. Bossu, Par. 1683.
24. Valesiane ou les Pensees Critiques de M. de Valois, Par. 1694.
27. Plutarque de la Superstition par M. le Flore Saum. 1666.
30. Voyage d'Espagne Col. 1688.
31. Lettres Nouvelles de M. Boursault. 1698.

32. Memoirs des Contraventions faites par la France (il manque le Titre) 1649.
33. L'Alcaran de Mahomet par le Sr. de Ryez. 1649.
34. Remarques Critiques, Morales et Historiques. Par. 1692.
35. Memoires de M. Le P. Bourdeille Sr. de Brantome. Tom 2. Leyd. 1666.
37. Nouvelle de la Repub, des Lettres pour Mois de Mars, Aout, May, Juin, Juillet. Amst. 1684.
38. Boralde Prince de Savoye, parte I. Leyd. 1672.
39. Les Comedies de Pierre de d'Arivey. Rouen. 1600.
40. Entretiens de Philandre et d'Euariste Gen. 1683.
41. Sorberiana, ou Bons Mots de M. Sorbiere. Par. 1694.
42. Histoires Tragiques tom. 2, 3, & 7. Lyon. 1591.
47. Les Entretiens d'Ariste & d'Eugene. Amst. 1671.

Libri Italiani Folio.

1. Palazzi di Roma de piu celebri Architetti disegnati da Pietro Ferreterio Pittore & Architetti. Roma.

Libri Italiani 8c. Hispan.

2. Tesoro de las 3 Lengues Espanola, Francesc. & Italiani. Gen. 1648.
3. Prima & 2 parte de Don Quixot de la Mancha, Madr. 1655.

Libri Italiani 4°.

1. Historia d'Italia de France Guiccardini. Ven. 1599.

3. Rime d'Isabelle Andreini, Par. 1603.
9. Le Vite de gli Imperadori & Pontef. Romani da Fr. Petrarca. 1625.
26. Vite di Plutarch tradotte, per Lod. Domeniche. Ven. 1620.

L. Italiani 8°.

1. Del Cortegiano del Conte Baldes. Castlignore. Ven. 1559.
4. Le Metamorfosi di Ovidio ridotte da Gio. Andrea con. annot. et Fig. Ven. 1661.
5. Dittionario Italiano et Francese par Nath. Duez. 2 vols. Gen. 1678.
11. Ritratto di Roma antica di Bart Marliani con Fig. Rom. 1638.
12. — di Roma Moderna con Fig. Rom. 1638.

L. Italiani 12°.

3. Il Putanismo Romano, Colon. 1668.
5. L'Anacreonte Drame per Musica Livern. 1700.
6. La Magia d'Amore del Sig. Guido Casoni. Ven. 1622.
12. Dell'Arte Histroica d'Agost. Mascardi. Ven. 1662.
14. Le Rete di Vulcano. Ven. 1641.

L. Italiani 12°.

Il Pastor Fido del S. Bart. Guarini. Amst.

A brief analysis of this list may help us to a closer understanding of our author's mind.

There is no Shakespeare and no Molière, though it is certain that Sedley must have possessed the works of both. It may be supposed that they were retained by his heirs.

The classical section is very comprehensive, but, as I have suggested, the Eminent Divine may have been a classical scholar. We can be fairly sure, however, that most of the numerous editions of Terence—there are no less than eight—belonged to the author of “Bellamira.” The Latin texts include the superbly printed folio, published by the Royal Press in Paris in 1642. The two English translations are the fifth edition (1629) of R. Bernard’s fine Elizabethan version, originally published in 1598, which may well have belonged to the poet’s father, and Charles Hoole’s very bald word for word “crib” “for the use of young scholars” (1676). The three French translations include that of the famous Madame Dacier. The Latin and Italian versions of Plutarch’s Lives were probably used for “Antony and Cleopatra,” and some of the Virgils, Horaces and Martials must have been Sedley’s, for he translated from all three poets, while the appeal that would have been made to him by such ancient and modern wits as Plautus, Lucian, and Erasmus, is obvious. “Rerum Anglic. post Bedam Scriptores editi a H. Savilio” and “Oweni Epigrammata” must have been heirlooms. The former is the monumental edition by Sir Charles’s maternal grandfather, Sir Henry Savile, of the early English historians after Bede, and the latter is one of the numerous editions of the Latin poems of John Owen, who, it will be remembered, addressed panegyrics to Sir William Sedley and his son, Sir John. The philosophical works are remarkable. They include books by the most advanced thinkers of the day. Among them are Spinoza, the great Jewish pantheist (represented by his most daring work, “Tractatus Theologico-Politicus”), Gassendi (Pierre Gassend), the French defender of Epicurus and teacher of Molière, and the famous René Descartes. The presence of Milton’s “Pro Populo Anglicano Defensus,” his Latin letters written for Cromwell, and “Eiconoclastes,” if they were Sedley's, is a further proof of the broadness of his culture. "Nebulo Nebulonum" is a series of burlesque Latin poems by a German scholar, Flittner, with amusing woodcuts, illustrating popular proverbs concerning fools, and "Sheltoni Tachygraphia" is the work of Thomas Shelton (1601-50?), the inventor of the system of shorthand used by Pepys for his Diary.

The English books are an interesting collection. Fiction is represented by "Pembrok's Arcadia" (i.e. Sir Philip Sidney's "The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia"), a translation of Cervantes' "Exemplary Novels" and, as we should expect, "The Grand Cyrus," Madeleine de Scudéry's "Artamène ou le Grand Cyrus," englished by F. G. and published in five massive folios in 1653-5.

There is a fair selection of English verse, and the presence of "Paradise Lost" and two editions of Donne's poems does credit to Sir Charles's taste. "Bochas's Tragedies Black Letter" is probably Lydgate's "Fall of Princes," translated from Boccaccio's "De Casibus Virorum et Fœminarum Illustrium," originally printed by Pynson in 1494. This may well have come down from old John Sedley of Southfleet, Henry VIII's Auditor of Exchequer. "Dryden's Juvenal" of 1693 is the original folio edition of the English Juvenal edited and partly translated by Dryden. It contains a reference to Sedley on p. 87, where, in his introduction to the sixth Satire, Dryden informs us that he requested "Sir C. S." to undertake this satire "because he could have done more right to the Author," but that after a long delay "he absolutely refus'd so ungrateful an employment." "The Devotions of his Majesty in his Solitudes in Verse 1657" is a folio pamphlet entitled "Psalterium Carolinum, the Devotions of his Sacred Majesty Charles II in his Solitudes and Sufferings Rendred into Verse . . . Set to musick for 3 voices, and an Organ or Theorbo, By John Wilson Dr. and Musick Professor of Oxford . . . London . . . 1657." It may be conjectured that this book was once the property of the loyal Elizabeth, Lady Sedley, the poet's mother. "Works of Joh. Taylor, the Water Poet" is probably the collected folio edition (1630) of the voluminous doggerel of that literary bargee. The "Poems and Translations by Oxford Hands 1685" is a miscellany of verses by Oxford men printed by Anthony Stephens, an Oxford bookseller. It contains on p. 165 a copy of verses "Upon the Slighting of his Friend's Love," signed "C. S." and attributed in the Table to "Mr. C. S. of Wadham." It is not impossible that this may have been an early piece by Sedley, which somehow drifted into Stephens' hands.¹ "Dryden's 3d part of Miscellany Poems 1693" is a volume of the famous miscellany of contemporary verse published by Tonson, to an earlier part of which Sedley himself contributed some translations of Ovid. The 1664 edition of Katherine Philips's poems contains most of her lyrics and shorter pieces, but not her versions of Corneille. "Gildon's new Collections of Poems Lond. 1701" is "A New Miscellany of Original Poems on Several Occasions," edited by Gildon, and containing several poems by Sedley, including his fine version of Horace's Eighth Ode of the Second Book, as well as some of Dorset's witty lines on Katherine Sedley. "Sir Joh. Denham's Poem of Old Age" is "Cato Major of Old Age," a version in heroic couplets of Cicero's "De Senectute": the date should be 1669.

The presence of works by Bacon, Burton, Montaigne (in Cotton's excellent translation) and Locke bears witness to an excellent taste in English prose, and there is a very interesting collection of contemporary literary criticisms, including Gildon's "Miscellany Letters and Essays of 1694," with their "Vindication" of Shakespeare against Rymer's attack, the "Miscellany Essays" of St. Evrémonde, the famous French critic who lived at the Court of Charles II and was one of the earliest Frenchmen to write intelligently about the English drama, Basil Kennet's "Lives of the Ancient Greek Poets" of 1697, a very uncritical work, and "The Whole Art of the Stage" translated from the French of the Abbé François Hédelin and published in 1684. The latter is less remarkable for its dramatic criticism proper, which is of the stiffest pseudo-classical brand, than for its excellent arguments and proposals in favour of improving the dignity and status of the theatre, actors and dramatists. Along with these we may notice Jeremy Collier's Defence of his "Short View of the Stage," which indicates that Sir Charles was interested in the controversy provoked by the non-juror's famous onslaught, and the two works of the protagonists in the dispute concerning the authenticity of the Letters of Phalaris, which was linked with the wider controversy concerning the rival merits of the Ancients and the Moderns. The political works were doubtless purchased at different stages of Sir Charles's parliamentary career. Among them may be noted Dr. Davenant's "Essay on Ways and Means of Supplying the War," which recalls the reference to his writings in Sedley's letter to Sir R. Newdigate of 12 January, 1698/9. The "Military Instruction for the Cavalry," "Bond's Guide for Justices of the Peace" and "Swinburn of Testaments and Last Wills" reflect the needs of the militia officer, the lord of the manor, and the owner of an extensive property. "Glanvil of Witches and Apparitions 1681" is the first edition of "Saducismus Triumphatus," in which Joseph Glanvil conclusively demonstrates (with awe-inspiring illustrations) the "Possibility" and "Real Existence" of witches and witchcraft. The numerous books of travel and historical and geographical works both in English and French are interesting testimonies to the increasing curiosity concerning the nature and history of the world that was characteristic of the age. "The Refin'd Courtier 1679" is a curious little work on etiquette and deportment by a certain N. W., who dedicates it to the Duke of Monmouth. Some of the things that N. W. advises the Duke to avoid throw considerable light on Restoration manners. For instance, there is an alarming glimpse of persons "who more like so many swine than men, put their Noses into a mess of Broth, and never lift up their Faces or Hands from the Dish, and that with their Cheeks distended and swoln (as if they were sounding a Trumpet or blowing a Fire) don't so properly eat as devour their Meat." "The Lady's New-Year's Gift" is another book on behaviour, being the advice of George Savile, Marquis of Halifax, the famous "Trimmer," to his daughter, published anonymously in 1688. It is rather curious that Sir George Etherege also possessed a copy of this work according to the list of his books made by his secretary at Ratisbon on his departure in 1689.¹ "Reflect. on the Secret History of K. Charles II and K. James 2d" must be a reply to a very scurrilous little book called "The Secret History of K. Charles II and K. James II," published in 1690. We may suppose that the theological works by Bishop Wilkins, formerly Warden of Sedley's college, were the property of his old pupil. "Wilkins of Prayer" is "A Discourse concerning the Gift of Prayer" (1653), and "Wilkins Beauty of Providence" is "A Discourse concerning the Beauty of Providence in all the Rugged Passages of It" (1649).

¹ See my forthcoming edition of the "Works of Sir Charles Sedley," where the full text is given.

The French section displays, as we should expect, a wide acquaintance with French literature. The drama is represented by an early collected edition of Racine, "Crispin bel Esprit," a comedy by Juvenon de La Thuillerie, a minor dramatist of the school of Molière, and the plays of Pierre de L'Arivey (1540-1611?), one of the earliest writers of French comedy, who, it may be noticed, was, like Sedley, an adapter of Terence.

¹ Ratisbon Letter Book, f. 192: "A Catalogue of Sr Georges Bookes."

There is a good selection of French prose, beginning with Philippe de Comines's famous Chronicle of Louis XI (wrongly catalogued as Loys II). "Memoires de M. le P. Bourdeille Sr. de Brantôme Tom 2. Leyd. 1666" is Brantôme's "Memoires contenant Les Vies des Hommes Illustres François de son temps." It may be confidently surmised that the writings of the author of "Les Vies des Femmes Galantes" appealed strongly to Sir Charles. "Histoires Tragiques tom. 2, 3 and 7. Lyon. 1591" is an early edition of François Belleforest's well-known collection, which contains the story of Hamlet. There is also an early edition of one of the greatest French prose classics of Sedley's own day, La Bruyère's "Caractères," which was published as a modest appendix to his translation of Theophrastus. There is much French literary criticism as we should expect in the library of Lisideius. Aristotle's Poetics in Madame Dacier's translation, with her commentary, and Bossu's "Du Poème Epique," are two of the chief expositions of the principles of the French classical school, and Sedley's interest in the controversy between the "Ancients" and the "Moderns" is again shown by the presence of Charles Perrault's "Parralèle des Anciens et Modernes," in which he upholds the claims of the "Siècle de Louis XIV" against the "Ancients." Besides these well-known works, there are a number of those miscellaneous books of literary criticism, compliment, gallantry and anecdote which were so numerous and popular in the reign of Louis XIV. They were probably the source of much of Sedley's admired conversation. "Valesiana ou les Pensées Critiques, Historiques, et Morales de Monsieur de Valois...à Paris...1693" contains the literary remains of Adrien de Valois, historiographer royal to Louis XIV (1607-93), a curious collection of odd learning and anecdote, with a long discussion of the coiffure of ladies of the ancient world, illustrated by an engraving of Cleopatra, which may have interested Sedley. "Lettres Nouvelles de M. Boursault. 1698" is an amusing collection of letters by Edme Boursault, a well-known writer of comedies (1638-1701). The "Lettres Nouvelles" contain a great many excellent stories which probably furnished material for Sir Charles's after-dinner conversation. "Sorberiana ou les bons Mots de M. Sorbière" is the table-talk of Samuel de Sorbière, a French writer, who translated Hobbes and wrote a most interesting account of his travels in England. "Les Entretiens d'Ariste et Eugène" is a series of polished dialogues by the Jesuit Père Bouhours. The two dialogues on "Le Bel Esprit" and "Le Je ne sais quoi" must have been very congenial reading for a man of Sedley's tastes. Such passages as the following furnish an interesting parallel to the new ideals of good writing which he and his friends were imposing on English literature. "Au reste, il ne suffit pas, pour avoir l'esprit beau, de l'avoir solide, pénétrant, délicat, fertile, juste, universel; il faut encore y avoir une certaine clarté que tous les grands génies n'ont pas. Car il y en a qui sont naturellement obscurs, et qui affectent même de l'être."

"Cependant il ne doit y avoir ni obscurité ni embarras dans tout ce qui part d'un bel esprit: ses pensées, ses expressions doivent être si nobles et si nettes que les intelligents l'admirent et que les plus simples l'entendent."¹ These sentences express the reaction of Dryden and his friends against the "metaphysicals," as well as that of Racine and Boileau against the Hôtel de Rambouillet.

Among the Spanish and Italian books we may notice "Don Quixote," Guarini's immensely popular "Il Pastor Fido" and Castiglione's "Il Cortegiano."

¹ "Entretiens d'Ariste et Eugène," ed. René Radouant (collection des Chefs-d'œuvres Méconnus) . . . 1920, pp. 160, 161. [The italics are mine.]

Some of the other Italian works have titles which are hardly likely to have been found in the library of an Eminent Divine. The presence of dictionaries and books of engravings of Rome suggests that Sedley may have visited Italy.

If this list represents fairly accurately the contents of Sedley's library, it is in itself a sufficient answer to the theory that the Restoration Wits were mere idlers with a thin veneer of meretricious culture. It is the library of a man of wide and genuine learning, who appears to have been in touch with most of the important currents of the European thought of his day.

APPENDIX III

DOCUMENTS ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF KATHERINE SEDLEY, COUNTESS OF DORCHESTER

- I. Letters of Katherine Sedley.
- II. Extracts from "Correspondance d'Angleterre" (Archives of the French Foreign Office), concerning Katherine Sedley.

I

SOME LETTERS OF KATHERINE SEDLEY

THE following note, which bears no date or superscription, is preserved among the Sackville family papers at the Public Record Office. I have been allowed to copy and print it by kind permission of Lord Sackville. It is the earliest specimen of Katherine's correspondence that I have been able to find. It was probably written soon after she was granted the title, and seems to refer to the house in St. James's Square in which she was to be installed. This house (No. 21, according to Dasent's "St. James's Square," pp. 181, 244) was formerly the property of another mistress of James II, Arabella Churchill, who married a Colonel Godfrey. Sir Edward Seymour was the well-known Tory politician, and Lord Godolphin is the first Earl, who was Chamberlain to Mary of Modena, and would naturally be consulted in an affair of this kind.

I

Madam I am grown A most hardend teaser which you are like to suffer by, the busines of my lodgins not being over, S^r Edward Seymour tells me the Queen spoke to y^r Brother before him to geve me A warrant for them L^d Godolphin who is a friend of the Noble race of the Churchills desierd hee might first geve notiſ to M^{is} Godfry but that being some time sence and my L^d Godolphens busines haveing taken it upon him I hope y^r brother will make his, helping me I shall leave a man in town to reseave these Keas dear Madam get this matter off my hands, for this solissiting makes me fit for Beaddlam

y^r most humble

servant

DORCHESTER.

The following two letters were formerly in the Morrison Collection of Autograph Letters (2nd Series, iii. 128). They were transcribed by Mr. G. Thorn Drury, who has kindly allowed me to copy his transcripts. They are addressed to a "Mr Nelson" and appear to have been written when the Countess was in exile in Ireland. The first is dated "March the 16" (?1686) and must have been written soon after the Countess reached Dublin.

2

I was never negglegent off my owne fault, but it will make me yet more carefull toe find people of your merett concerned for me, soe I thank you for the assurance you geve me. You will hear, by a letter I wret Lady Thea, that I am got to Dubblin without any ill accident. The English have generally a humour I doe not approve off, which is afecting toe like nothing but thare owne country, soe ware it possible I would commend this place, but tis intollerable. I find them not only senceless, but a mallincolly sort of people and speak all in the tone off the cripples off London, yet I doe not find my Lord Clarrindon takes much amongst them, but one may perceave thare feare of Lord Torconnell makes them speake less ill than otherways they would doe.

Mr Fergus Grahms tells me you say my lodgings are gone. I had nott heard off itt before but 'tis very probable, because 'tis so very gentealy done. Pray writ tow me and send me all the news. Adieu. My humble service toe y^r lady.

The second letter is dated "12th May," probably in the same year.

3

I wish I had better news to send you off myself, but I have bin and am still, very ill; and now that I disspaire of having any helth in this place, the Queen's pious mind is in sume danger off being discomposd, iff my return will doe itt. I confess I wonder itt should, for she knows the respect the King has for the prests; and they say to him as toe my persecutour, as God did toe Adam, "Off every tree in the Garding thou mayest freely eate, but off this tree thou shalt not eate off itt, for in the day that thou eatist thou shalt surely dye." Iff such a declaration as this will not sever the King from me in the Queen's openioun, she thinks much better off me then I deserve. Pray give my humble service to my Lord Bartle, and thanke him for me. I have reseaved three potts more of lampress that ware extreme good, and as good company as this place afords drunck his helth.

The match you writ off concerning the Lord Arron I beleve true, for some people love to propagaite ffools. I dought the pretty little widdow will come in at that toe, for her choyse is not very good. I thought she would have bin true toe love, and have marryed Tolmedge; sure she has Royall blood in her, she is soe fickle. Pray write toe me offen, for letters from England are the only thinges that make this place suportable. Send the news true or false, I care not. I love an English lye, I am sure tis non to tell you I am your most humble servante."

I am unable to identify "Lady Thea." "Clarrindon" is the second Earl of Clarendon, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and brother of Lawrence Hyde, Earl of Rochester, Katherine's old ally. "Torconnell" is Richard Talbot, Earl of Tyrconnel, the best hated of James's Roman Catholic advisers, at this time in command of the English army in Ireland. "Mr Fergus Grahms" is probably a relative of Colonel James Grahme, Katherine's old admirer. "My Lord Bartle" may be the Countess's spelling of "Lord Berkely," first Earl, who formerly entertained her father at the Durdans. "The Lord Arron" is the second Earl of Arran, eldest son of the Duke of Hamilton, who married Ann Spencer, daughter of the second Earl of Sunderland on 12 January, 1677-8. This must be the match to which the Countess refers so tartly. She must have borne Sunderland a grudge because of the part he played in persuading James II to dismiss her. I cannot identify "the pretty little widdow," but "Tolmedge" must be Thomas Tolle-mache or Talmash, the well-known soldier, later distinguished for his service in William III's wars with France. He was created a lieutenant-colonel of Fusiliers by James II, but threw up his commission because of his disagreement with the King's policy.

Another letter, probably written in Dublin, survives in the British Museum among the Clarendon papers, and shows that, with all her faults, Katherine had a good heart. It seems to convey her thanks to the Earl of Clarendon, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, for his influence exercised on behalf of a needy gentleman at her request. "Mr Grahme" is probably the Mr. Fergus Grahme mentioned in the second letter to Mr. Nelson.

4

The bearer of this my Lord is the Gentleman I desired Mr Grahme to recomend to Your lordship and tho he tells me you have bin so oblidging toe grant my request for which I return my humble thanks yet I cannot but be ashaimed that he made it in my name for having so smale an acquaintance with you my lord your lordship may jeustly look upon it as an impertinence in me to ask you anything but the party is in want, and when you consider how much we wemen are inclined to do Good natur'd things and how seldom they do proper ones, you will not wonder at this proseeing off

My Lord,
Y^r Lordships humble servante
K. SEDLEY." ¹

Among the Sloane MSS. in the British Museum are the following brief notes from Lady Dorchester to Sir Hans Sloane. They are undated, but the reference to "my Lord" shows that they were written after her marriage.²

5

Sr

Pray be with me at teen to morrow morning or before five in the Evening my Lord has

¹ Brit. Mus., Add. MSS. 15,892, f. 259.

² Sloane MSS. 4060, ff. 64, 66.

had a present of white wine from Gebraltaire I have sent you by the porter three dozen of it thinking it very good I hope wee shall be alone for I cannot understand that theres safety in multitude of Councillers tho Solomon himself sayes it

Your most humble servant

DORCHESTER.

Saterday night to Sr Hans Sloane.

6

Sir

Pray let me know if I am to drink the Bath waters with my wine at meales for I never drink but then being of a hott dry Constitution (so) I have been told; and pray tell me what sort of wine I may drink besides sack that being a wine dos not help appetite.

Your

humble servant

DORCHESTER.

To Sir Hans Sloane.

The Countess's latest extant letter almost certainly refers to the Resumptions Bill of April 1711, when she ran a grave risk of losing the estates granted to her by her royal lover (see p. 237).

7

Brit. Mus., Add. MSS. 28,569, f. 38.

S^{ir}

The vote that has bin carryd In the Parlement of the land against my pention, geves you this trouble tho Sir our acquaintance is not enough to exspect on every occation your assistance as a zealous friend, yet your carriage in the world being such as to assure me of your good sense, and good Nature, and mine being a matter in which you may shew at a time both these qualities. I dare depend upon your utmost Endeavors to shelter my lord and me from this rash nest of our Enimys, not to geve it the term which between You and me it deserves, of Mallice. It is sure a great egnorance, if not worse to term a grant five thousand per an that is but three, and but for life as Baron Worth can perticulourly Inform you and of which I beg you to Instru^t others, I have so worthyly bestood this pention in the persone of my Lord Portmore, that I cant but wonder it should be attackt, at least in a Country where he has acted so honnorably and if I may put them in mind of it, so deferantly in that from what many other offecers did In the troubles waire lately amongst them, I hope the Irish Nobility and Gentry will not geve us reason here to think: useing them well or ill is all one, when a return is expected, now S^{ir}, if a Lady be not thought too pretending in geveing her opinoun in these high matters I would say, tis a little unpolitick In them so grossely to spare one anoether of which I could geve several instance and onely fly at the English; and a Part of the Clargey that is not taken to be quite so frendless as thay may supose. but as thay have repented of their cruelty to them as some letters inform us, I hope they will turn more favorable in what relates to me and my lord I must beg you to use your interest in bringing that about, for tho I can never think the Queen will be brought to overturn a grant of her fathers or ruing my lord at home while hee is imployed in so dangerous service abraud yet, I must oone to you I should be sorry to be obledged to the Queen for not takeing from me what I have, I hope to have occasion toe thank her for whats to come; therefore onse more, I intreate you to apeer in my enterest, I am sure it will be acknowledged with a sincere gratitude to my lord and you & ever engage

Sir

Your most humble
Servant

DORCHESTER.

My lord geves you
his most humble service
hee hopes my letter will be as efectual with you as his hee has not a moments time to him self.

II

EXTRACTS FROM "CORRESPONDANCE D'ANGLETERRE"

(Archives of French Foreign Office, Quai D'Orsai.)
Bonrepaux a Londres ce 3 Jan^{er} 1686.

tom. 157, ff. 47, 48.

Il y a une nouvelle icy Mgr qui occupe et qui partage toute la Cour. Le Roy d'Ang^{le} a déclaré
M^{le} Chidley Comtesse elle estoit fille d'honneur de la Reine lorsqu'elle estoit duchesse d'York. Sa M.B. en devint amoureux, et en a eu deux enfans dont l'on vit encore. A son avènement a la Couronne ce Roy declara qu'il ne la verroit plus et rompit, publiquement avec elle. Je scay bien certainement que cette rupture estoit de bonne foy en cetems la, quoyque aujourdhuy le public ne le croye point, mais une personne qui est la confidente et l'intime amie de la D^e et qui ne me cache rien me dit il y a un mois qu'il estoit vray que le Roy d'Ang^{le} avoit esté trois mois sans la voir apres cette declaration, mais que depuis quelque

tems il la voyoit en cachette a Witheall ou elle a toujours logé dans l'appartement que M^e Bocky, qu'on appelle icy presentement Mad^e Sophie, luy a cedé, et ce que me confirme dans la pensés que le Roy d'Angl^{re} a toujours entrenu un commerce avec elle, c'est que je scay par un de ses confidens qu'il luy a acheté une maison dans la ville de 30^{oo} escus, et que les meilleurs peintres et les meilleurs sculpteurs de Londres travaillent a l'orner. Je scay aussi qu'on luy a augmenté sa pension qui n'estoit que de deux mil livres sterlin, et qu'outre cela le garde de la privé bours qui est le confident de cette intrigue luy fournit tout l'argent dont elle a besoin pour ses meubles, et pour ses menus plaisirs, cette fille est forte laide, aigre et hautaine, mais elle a beaucoup d'esprit, la plus part des courtisans pensent que c'est Milord Rochester et sa femme qui ont renoué cette aff^{re}, mais assurément il ny a que l'inclination que le Roy d'Angl^e a pour elle qui a fait cela, n'ayant point d'autre confident pour ce qui la regarde que M. Grimps garde de la privé bourse et frere de Milord Preston, une Irlandoise qui a esté femme de Chambre de Mad^e de Portsmouth mariée avec Oglethorp colonel d'un regiment, et une au-[tr]e personne dont j'ay eu l'honneur de vous parler. Le Reine d'Ang^{re} a eu un chagrin extreme de cette declaration qu'elle na pû dissimuler au public je scay mesme que le Roy d'Ang^{re} pour la contenter a escrit un billet au Chan^{cr} pour luy ordonner de surceoir l'expedition des lettres. Ce n'est cependant qu'un retardement car il est bien assuré que M^{lle} Cidley sera Countesse.

Londres le 4 Février 1686, f. 53.

Depuis que j'ay escrit cecy j'ay eu occasion d'entretenir Milord Sunderland sur l'eloygnement de M^{le} Cidley a present Comtesse de Dorchester dont j'auray l'honneur de vous parler. . . .

f. 54, 55.

La Reine d'Ang^e a repris le dessus et a eu toute sorte de satisfaction au sujet de la nouvelle Comtesse d'Orcheſter [sic] elle a consenti que les lettres fussent expédiées a condition que le Roy d'Ang^{re} ne la verra plus et qu'elle sortira de Wethall, elle en sortit effectivement hier au soir et coucha dans sa maison de la ville, on croit a la Cour qu'elle ira en Hollande, La Reyne s'en flatte et elle se dit a une de ses confidentes qu'il n'avoit tenu qu'a elle d'empescher l'expédition des lettres que le Roy son mary en usoit si bien sur cela qu'elle s'en fioit a sa parole. Il est certain que la Reine d'Ang^{re} a temoigné beaucoup de conduite et de fermeté dans cette occassion.

Barillon to Louis XIV 31 Jan. 1686.

tom. 158, ff. 74, 75.

Mad^{lle} Sidelay a le titre de Comtesse de Dorcheſter. On a sceu que le Roy d'Ang^{re} la voyoit assez souvent, et qu'elle venoit chez Chifins, mais on ne s'attendoit pas quil luy donnaſt un titre. Le bruit de la Cour est que dans la suite, Elle aura les logemens de Mad^e de Portsmouth. Je ne scais point que cela doive estre, et je croirois pluſtoſt que le Roy d'Ang^{re} ne la verra, que comme il faisoit.

Cette nouvelle fait un grant bruit a Londres, et cause une grande agitation dans le dedans de la Cour. Les Catholiques en sont affligés et alarmés, croyons que cela ne s'est fait que par une cabale dans laquelle quelqu'un des ministres est entré.

Barillon 4 fév. 1686. tom. 158, f. 82.

L'Affaire de Mad^{lle} de Sidelay a receu un grand changement. Elle a la patente de Comtesse de Dorcheſter, mais le Roy d'Ang^{re} a déclaré qu'il ne la verroit plus. Il s'est engagé de parole formelle a la faire sortir de Londres et mesme d'Angleterre. Elle a desja pris le party de sortir de la Cour. Ce Prince a reconnu de quelle consequence il estoit pour luy de contenter en cela non seulement le Reyne Sa femme, mais mesme les plus zélés de ses serviteurs Catholiques et protestans. Cette affaire a causé un mouvement fort grand dans le dedans de la Cour pendent plusieurs jours.

Il y a encore des gens qui s'imaginent que l'eloignement de cette nouvelle Comtesse ne sera que pour peu de temps mais je crois scavoir le contraire, et que le Roy d'Ang^{re} a pris sur cela de engagemens trop forts pour y manquer.

Barillon 7 fév. 1686. f. 84-92.

Le Roy d'Ang^{re} temoigna ouvertement a son avènement a la Couronne qu'il ne vouloit pas voir M^{lle} Sideley. Il le promit aux Cat^{ques} et le monde crût en ce temps la que cette declaration avoit produit un fort bon effet pour luy.

Mad^{lle} Sidelay est demeurée dans un petit logement en vue des cours de Withehall qu'elle avoit acheté pendant la vie du feu Roy. Elle venoit souvent chez Mad^e de Portsmouth, et étoit fort ben traité du feu Roy, qui prenoit plaisir à l'entretenir.

Elle a beaucoup d'esprit et de vivacité mais elle n'a plus aucune beauté, et est d'une extresme maigreur. Elle se comporta fort hardiment a la mort du feu Roy, et declara qu'elle ne sortiroit point, de Withehall. Elle y est demeurée, quoyqu'elle eust une maison fort bien meublée dans la place de St. Gemes qui luy avoit esté achetée par le Duc d'York.

Le confident de l'intrigue avec Mademoiselle Sideley est le S^r. Cremme, qui a la bourse privée du Roy d'Anglet^{re}. C'est le frere de Milord Preston. Il n'est pas mal avec son maistre et est fort uny avec Milord d'Artmouth [sic] grand Escuyer. Il y a quelques mois que le Roy d'Angleterre a recommencé a voir Mad^{lle} Sideley. Elle venoit le plus souvent chez Chiffins ; c'est un appartement au dessous l'appartement ou tout le monde entre. On a sceu que le grand Tresorier avoit des mesnagements pour Mad^{lle} Sideley et qu'il la voyoit quelquefois mais on ne croyoit pas que cela devoit avoir d'autre suites que de demeurer, comme elle estoit à Withal et de tirer beaucoup de presents et d'argent.

M^{lle} de Sideley s'est trouvée grosse. Elle avoit eu un fils qui est mort. Il luy reste une fille ses amis ont crû qu'elle devoit avoir une titre et que le Roy d'Ang^{re} ne pouvoit le luy refuser. Il se sont bien attend^{us} que la Reyne d'Ang^{re} temoigneroit d'abord quelque chagrin mais ils ont crû que sa resistance se termineroit a refuser au plus de la voir, et de la traiter, comme une Comtesse.

On pretend que Milord Rochester et sa femme ont assuré le Roy qu'il luy seroit aisé d'appaiser la Reyne, et qu'ainsy il s'estoit déterminé a donner le titre de Comtesse a sa Maitresse.

En mesme temps on croit que Mad^e de Rochester avoit insinué à la Reyne que la veritable inclination du Roy estoit pour Mademoiselle de Grafton, Et on a remarqué que la Reyne la traistoit moins bien que l'ordre. Tout cela se faisoit dans de dessein de faire penser a la Reyne que l'Affaire de Mad^{lle} de Sideley n'estoit rien de consequence, et que le Roy vouloit seulement donner un titre à une personne qu'il avoit aymée et dont il ne se soucioit plus.

Mais quand il a esté publié que Mad^{lle} Sideley seroit Comtesse et qu'elle pretendoit paroistre à la Cour, la Reyne a esté dans une affliction desmesurée.

Elle ayme de bonne foy le Roy son Mary. Elle est Italienne et fort glorieuse. Sa douleur a esclaté vivement. Je crois que sous main on l'a fortifiée et encouragée. Elle a déclaré nettement qu'Elle ne souffriroit point le Scandale public qu'on pretendoit etablir, qu'elle ne verroit point la nouvelle Comtesse et que si le Roy ne s'en separoit elle se retireroit dans une Couvent en quelque pays que ce fust. Le Roy d'Ang^{re} a esté fort surpris d'abord de cette resistance, qu'il a attribuée a la passion que la Reyne a pour luy. Il a cru qu'il pourroit l'appaiser mais il a trouvé une fermeté qui l'a étonné.

Les Catholiques et Milord Sonderland a leur teste sont venus au secours de la Reyne. On a fait parler le père Petirs et tous ceux qui ont du credit et en qui sa Majesté Britannique a confiance. Ils luy ont représenté quel scandale ce seroit a Rome et dans toute la Chrestienté qu'un Prince qui a tout hazardé pour la Religion Cath^{que} voulust paroistre dans un dereglement tel que celuy là. On luy a insinué que s'estoit l'effet d'une Cabale de gens qui vouloient le decrier au dedans et au dehors de son Royaume et le detournir des bonnes resolutions qu'il semble avoir prises. Le Chancelier s'est joint a Milord Sonderland. Le Roy d'Angleterre a trouvé du fondement a ce qu'on luy disoit. Il ne se soucie pas beaucoup dans le fond de M^{lle} Sideley. Enfin il s'est déterminé a faire ce que la Reyne vouloit et a croire le conseil de ses plus confidens serviteurs.

Ils n'ont pas jugé de voir s'opposer a ce que le titre de Comtesse fust donné a Mad^{lle} Sideley parceque l'affaire avoit éclaté et n'est en soy d'aucune consequence.

Mais on s'est renfermé a demander qu'Elle sorte de la Cour et de Londres. Le Roy d'Angl^{re} a promis l'une et l'autre positivement a la Reyne sa femme, et l'a declare aux Milords Cat^{ques} et aux Ministres qui luy en ont parlé.

Il est a remarqué que le grand Trésorier n'a point paru en tout cela et n'a fait aucun pas en faveur de la Reyne. Il a esté mesme quatre ou cinq jours sans la voir. On n'a pas manqué de faire connoître, qu'Elle a esté trahie et abandonnée par ceux en qui Elle avoit plus de confiance. Elle a esté honteuse de n'avoir rien sceu du commerce que le Roy d'Ang^{re} avoit depuis quelque temps avec Mad^{lle} Sideley.

Milord Tresorier et sa femme ont voulu se justifier aupres de la Reyne, Elle le fait semblant d'admettre leur excuses mais ils sont perdus en son esprit et l'autre Cabale pretend mesme faire connoistre au Roy d'Angleterre qu'on l'a embarqué dans une affaire qui blessait sa reputation et qui ruinoit son repos domestique. Tout cela a causé une grande agitation dans le dedans de la Cour et est devenu une affaire de party. Tous les Catholiques ont paru d'abord consternés et affligés mais les protestans Zelés tout affligés a leur tour.

On dit mesme que la Comtesse de Dorchester publie qu'Elle est la victime de la Religion Protestante et qu'Elle est opprimée par la faction des Catholiques.

Elle ne se pas [sic] d'avoir souvent dit au Roy d'Angleterre que Milord Arundel et Milord Tirconel luy feroient perdre sa Couronne. Le Comte d'Adda a joué son personnage, quoyqu'il n'ait pas paru, et a dit son avis qui a esté rapporté au Roy d'Angleterre et a produit son effet.

Cela paroist presentement comme une victoire remportée par le Party de Catholiques et de ceux qui sont joint a eux.

Le Roy d'Angleterre temoigne estre fort content de ce qu'il a fait et se scait bon gré d'avoir suivy les conseils de ses veritables serviteurs.

Il a intention qu'on croye que son dessein n'a point esté d'establir a la Cour la Comtesse de Dorchester mais seulement de luy donner une titre et de l'éloigner; Il est vray cependant que l'affaire s'est passée comme j'ay honneur de la mander a V.M.

Milord Sonderland m'a informé a mesure de tout le detail qu'il arrivoit quelque incident. Je me suis tenu une grande retenue sans paroistre me mesler de rien, mais j'ay redoublée mon assiduité à la Cour, et la Reyne a été bien assurée que je suis dans ses intérêts par la connoissance qui j'ay de l'amitié et de l'estime que V. M. a pour elle. Peutestre me serat-il nécessaire que je dise quelque chose de la part de V. M. car cette Princesse regarde cette affaire comme la plus importante qu'elle aura de la vie. Je le feray sans me commettre, quand V. M. m'en aura donné l'Ordre.

Milord Sonderland croit tirer de grands avantages pour luy, et pour son party d'avoir si bien servy la Reyne. Il croit le grand Tresorier fort affoibly, et que c'est une marque de son peu de credit d'avoir formé ou Soustenue le projet de l'establissement d'une maitresse a la Cour, et de n'avoir pas reussy en ce projet.

Les amis de la Comtesse de Dorchester luy ont conseillé de point consentir a son éloignement, et de s'opiniâtrer a demeurer dans sa maison. Cela donna encore hier quelque inquietude a la Reyne, mais le Roy luy a promis positivement de ne se point relascher. Il consulta sur le champ avec Milord Chancelier, Milord Sonderland, et Milord Godolfin. Il fut resolu que Milord Midelton secretaire d'Estat iroit declarer a Mad^e la Comtesse de Dorchester de la part du Roy d'Ang^{re} qu'ayant dit d'abord que son dessein estoit d'aller en Hollande, il y avoit un yacht prest pour l'y conduire, et que si elle ne prenoit pas le party de s'embarquer incessamment, elle seroit conduite et menée ailleurs, selon qu'il seroit trouvée plus a propos.

On a fait une raillerie pendant tout hier, que la Comtesse de Dorchester se tenoit aux priviliges de Magna Carta, et pretendoit qu'on ne pouvoit pas obliger a sortir d'Angleterre.

Cette pretention est fort mal fondée en une affaire de cette nature, mais il y a des gens qui croient que la Comtesse de Dorchester est fortifiée sous main et que le Roy d'Ang^{re} mesme n'est pas fasché de la resistance qu'elle y apporte. Peutestre cela se terminera par une retraite a la campagne. Les amis du grand Tresorier disent qu'il n'a aucune part a ce que se passe et qu'il ne s'est meslé ny de l'elevation de la Comtesse de Dorchester ny de sa grace, qui dans le poste ou il est, son devoir l'engage a vouloir tout ce qui plaist a son maistre, et qu'il n'appartient a personne d'entrer dans de telles affaires pour les traverser ou pour les favoriser sans y estre appelé. Il est vray cependant que Milord Rochester et sa femme paroissent abattus et fort chagrin on ne croit pas que la Reyne leur pardonne, ny que le Roy luy mesme soit content d'avoir esté engagé a une chose dont il a esté obligé de se dédire, et dont il reconnoist a present tout les inconveniens.

f. 98 [same date].

J'ay sceu ce soir que la Comtesse de Dorchester fait semblant d'estre malade pour ne point partir. Elle a fait proposer d'aller en Irlande pour ne point sortir des Estats de Sa Maj^{te} Britannique. Elle demande aussy qu'en cas qu'elle aille en hollande il luy soit permis de voir Madlle la Princesse d'Orange, et qu'elle soit bien traittee. Cette negociation et les delais deplaisent fort la Reyne qui ne sera point enrepos qu'elle ne soit pas partie. Cela peut aller encore a quelques jours, mais il n'a a guere d'apparence que le Roy d'Ang^{re} change de resolution, ny qu'il se relasche apres s'estre déclaré aussy positivement qu'il a fait.

Barillon 21 fév. 1686. f. 106-7.

La Comtesse de Dorchester pretend s'estre blessée et avoir fait une fausse couche. Elle declare—pourtant qu'elle partira dans peu de jours et se retirera ou il plaira a sa M^{te} Britannique. On ne scait encore si ce sera en Irlande ou dans une province d'Angleterre éloignée de Londres. Les amis de cette Comtesse disent qu'Elle n'a jamais refusé de se retirer de la Cour, mais qu'Elle n'a pu se resoudre d'aller en flandres ou en france comme on le luy a proposé craignant qu'on ne la mist dans un Couvent ce qu'elle apprehende plus que la mort. Un discours si peu raisonnable se tient pour nourrir toujours dans les esprits une aigreur contre la Religion Catholique. La Reyne d'Ang^{re} paroît fort contente et cette affaire qui a causé beaucoup d'agitation dans le dedans de la Cour paroît finie, mais l'aigreur et les contestations qu'Elle a formées ne finiront pas si tost. Le Grand Tresorier pretend n'avoir eu aucune part a tout ce qui s'est passe, et que ce qu'on a dit sur ce sujet est une artifice de ses ennemis qui l'ont voulu mettre mal avec la Reyne.

Barillon 14 fév. 1686. f. 111.

L'affaire de la Comtesse de Dorchester paroît entierement terminée. Elle doit partir dans trois jours pour d'Irlande ou Elle a des terres qui luy ont esté données par le Roy d'Angleterre.

Barillon 18 fév. 1686. f. 119.

La Comtesse de Dorchester doit partir tous les jours pour l'Irlande mais elle differe le plus qu'Elle peut et le Roy d'Ang^{re} a de la peine a user contrainte a son egard de quelque jours plus ou moins. Cependant on luy represente que ce retardement fait tenir de discours opposes en ce qu'il desire et que sa reputation souffre de ne pas finir entierement cette affaires. Je crois que luy mesme a fort envie d'estre hors de cet embarras et qu'il voudroit que la Comtesse de Dorchester fust partie.

Toutes les apparences sont que le dessein estoit formé de se servir d'Elle pour avoir dans le Cour un party qui s'opposast a tout ce qui se fait en faveur de la Religion Catholique—et qui pust mesme tourner en ridicules ceux qui ont le plus de part aux resolution qui se prennent, a quoy la Comtesse resté fort propre. On prend beaucoup de soin d'ouvrir entierement les yeux de la Reyne d'Angleterre sur cela et de luy faire comprendre que ne pouvant esperer qu'Elle voulust entrer dans les mesures opposées aux veritables interêts et aux desseins du Roy son mary on vouloit avoir dans le Cour un appuy qui put au moins retarder l'exécution des bonnes resolutions et soutenir le party des Protestans Zelés.

23 fév. 1686. f. 133.

On croit que la Comtesse de Dorchester doit partir incessamment pour l'Irlande. La Reyne d'Angleterre paroist contente. Je ne m'avanceray trop en luy parlant sur une matiere si delicate. Elle voit bien que les amis de la Comtesse de Dorchester ne sont pas partisans de la France ni de la Religion Catholique. . . .

APPENDIX IV

I. PRINCIPAL MANUSCRIPT SOURCES

- Correspondance d'Angleterre: Louis XIV.
(Letters of French Ambassadors in England:
Quai d'Orsai.)
- Etherege, Sir George. Ratisbon Letter Book.
(Transcript of Letters, etc. written by Sir George Etherege while English Envoy at Ratisbon in
MS. of Secretary: Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 11,513.)
- Haward, Sir William. MS. Diary.
(Collection of Mr. G. Thorn Drury.)
- Le Neve, Peter. MS. Diary.
(Collection of Mr. G. Thorn Drury.)
- Newdigate Family Papers: Letters of Sir Charles Sedley, etc.
(By kind permission of Sir Francis Newdigate, Bart., of Arbury, Warwickshire.)
- Prideaux, Col. W. F., MS. notes, etc. on the Sedley genealogy, formerly in the possession of Col.
W. F. Prideaux.
(Kindly lent to the author by Mr. G. Thorn Drury.)
- Rugge's Diurnall.
(Brit. Mus., Add. MSS. 10,116; 10,117.)
- Sackville Family Papers: Letters of Sir Charles Sedley,
etc. (Public Record Office.)
(By kind permission of Baron Sackville of Knole.)
- Stanhope, Philip, second Earl of Chesterfield. Letter Book.
(MS. of Secretary. Brit. Mus., Add. MS.
19,253.)

- State Papers, Domestic: Charles I, Interregnum, Charles II, William III. (Public Record Office: see references to "State Papers Dom." in footnotes.)
- State Papers, France, Charles II.
(Public Record Office: see references to "State Papers, France" in footnotes.)

II. BIBLIOGRAPHY

(Only short titles are given.

In the case of rare works, shelf numbers in the British Museum, Bibliothèque Nationale, etc. are quoted.

For a detailed Bibliography of Works by or attributed to Sir Charles Sedley, see my forthcoming edition of the Works.

Works dedicated to members of the Sedley family are preceded by an asterisk.)

ABERCROMBIE, Lascelles.

The Idea of Great Poetry. London, 1925. 8vo.

AIRY, Osmund.

Charles II. London, Paris and Edinburgh, 1901. Fol.

AITKEN, George A.

Life of Richard Steele. London, 1889. 2 vols. in 8vo.

ANNESLEY, Arthur, first Earl of Anglesey.

A Letter from a Person of Honour in the Countrey written to the Earl of Castlehaven. London, 1681. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 601, d. 10.)

ARBER, E.

The Term Catalogues 1668-1709. Privately Printed, London, 1903. 3 vols. in fol.

ARCHÆOLOGIA CANTIANA, being Transactions of the Kent Archæological Society. London, 1860. 18 vols. in 8vo.

ARMSTRONG, G. F.

The Ancient and Noble Family of the Savages of the Ards . . . by G. F. A. London, 1888. 4to.

AUBREY, John.

Brief Lives chiefly of Contemporaries set down . . . between the years 1669 and 1696. Edited from the author's MSS. by Andrew Clark. Oxford, 1898. 2 vols. in 8vo.

BAILEY, Thomas.

Annals of Nottinghamshire, 1853. 8vo.

BAILLON, Comte Henri de.

Henriette Anne d'Angleterre. Paris, 1886. 8vo.

BAKER, David Erskine.

A Companion to the Playhouse, 1764. 2 vols. in 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 239. d. 5.) See also Biographia Dramatica.

BARRET, William.

*Heliodorus his Ethiopian History: Done out of Greeke, London, 1622. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 1074, l. 10.)

(Underdown's translation, edited by William Barret, dedicated to Sir John Sedley of Southfleet.)

BEHN, Aphra.

Poems upon Several Occasions . . . London, 8vo, 1684. (Brit. Mus. 1078, l. 8.)

The Works . . . edited by Montague Summers, Stratford-on-Avon, 1915. 6 vols. in 8vo.

BELJAME, Alexandre.

Le Public et les Hommes de Lettres en Angleterre dans le Dix-huitième Siècle, 1660-1744. Paris, 1881 (1st edition); Paris, 1897 (2nd edition, enlarged). 8vo.

BETTERTON, Thomas.

The Amorous Widow; or the Wanton Wife, a comedy, London, 1729. 12mo. (Brit. Mus. 11,775, b. 53.) See also Lowe, Robert W.

BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA, or the lives of the most eminent Persons who have flourished in Great Britain and Ireland. London, 1747-66. 6 vols. in fol.

BIOGRAPHIA DRAMATICA, or a Companion to the Playhouse (by David Erskine Baker). London, 1782.

2 vols. in 8vo.

Second edition, "with additions and improvements," London, 1812. 3 vols. in 8vo.

BIOGRAPHIE GÉNÉRALE, Nouvelle . . . publiée par MM.
Firmin Didot Frères . . . sous la direction de
M. le Dr. Hoefer. Paris, 1855.

BIOGRAPHY, DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL.

Ed. Leslie Stephen and Sidney Lee. London, 1908.

BIRRELL, Augustine.

Andrew Marvell (English Men of Letters).
London, 1905. 8vo.

BOUHOURS, Le Père.

Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugène. Introduction et Notes de René Radouant. Paris, 1920. 8vo.
(Collection des Chefs-d'Œuvres Méconnus.)

BREWER, J. S.

Letters and Papers Foreign and Domestic of the Reign of Henry VIII, Second Edition, revised and greatly enlarged by R. H. Brodie. London, 1920. 12 vols. in 8vo.

BROWN, Thomas, of Shifnal (Tom Brown).

The Works of Mr. Thomas Brown. Serious and Comical in Verse and Prose. In Four Volumes.
London, 1720. 4 vols. in 12mo. (Brit. Mus.
12,271, a.15.)

BRUEYS, David Augustin de, et Palaprat, Jean.

Le Grondeur, comedie . . . Paris . . . 1693. 12mo.
(Bibl. Nat. Yf. 3664.)

BUCKINGHAM, second Duke of. See George Villiers.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, first Duke of. See Sheffield, John.

BULLEN, A. H.

Musa Proterva. London. Privately Printed, 1889.
8vo.

BURGHCLERE, Baroness.

George Villiers, Second Duke of Buckingham.
London, 1903. 8vo.

BURKE, John and John Bernard.

A Genealogical History of Extinct and Dormant

Baronetages of England, Scotland and Ireland.
Second Edition. London, 1844. 8vo.

BURKE, Sir Bernard.

A Genealogical History of the Dormant, Abeyant, Forfeited, and Extinct Peerages of the British Empire. London, 1883. 8vo.

BURNET, Gilbert.

History of His Own Time, with the suppressed passages . . . notes of the Earls of Dartmouth, Hardwick and Speaker Onslow . . . cursory remarks of Swift. Oxford, 1823. 6 vols. in 8vo.

History of My Own Time, Part I, The Reign of Charles II. Edited by Osmund Airy. Oxford, 1897. 2 vols. in 8vo.

A Supplement to Burnet's History of My Own Time derived from his Original Memoirs, etc. . . . all hitherto unpublished. Edited by H. C. Foxcroft. Oxford, 1902. 8vo.

Some Passages of the Life and Death of the Right Honourable John Earl of Rochester . . . the Sixth edition. London, 1724. 8vo.

CALENDAR OF STATE PAPERS, Domestic Series.

Ed. Mary Everett Green. (See references in footnotes.)

CALENDAR OF STATE PAPERS: Treasury Books.

Prepared by W. A. Shaw. (See references in footnotes.)

CALENDAR OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE COMMITTEE FOR ADVANCE OF MONEY.

Ed. Mary Everett Green. London, 1888. 3 vols. in 8vo.

CALENDAR OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE COMMITTEE
FOR COMPOUNDING, ETC., 1645-60.

Ed. Mary Everett Green. London, 1889. 5 vols. in 8vo.

CAMBRIDGE HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. See
Whibley, Charles H.

Modern History. See Firth, Sir C. H.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.

Moeſtissimae ac Laetissimae Cantabrigiensis affectus decedente Carolo II succedente Jacobo II . . . Cantabrigial 1684/5. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 161, n. 13.)

CAMDEN, William.

Britain . . . written first in Latin by William Camden . . . Translated newly into English by P. Holland . . . Amended and enlarged. London, 1610. Fol. (Brit. Mus. 456, l. 16.)

CAMPBELL, John, Baron Campbell.

The Lives of the Lord Chancellors and Keepers of the Great Seal from the Earliest Times to the Reign of King George IV. Fourth edition. London, 1856/7. 10 vols. in 8vo.

CARLELL, Lodowick.

Heraclius Emperour Of the East. A Tragedy . . . Englished by Lodowick Carlell, Esq.; London, 1664, 4to. (Brit. Mus. 643, c. 64.)

CHANCELLOR, Edwin Beresford.

The Lives of the Rakes. London, 1924.

Vol. I. Old Rowley.

Vol. II. The Restoration Rakes: Buckingham, Rochester, Sedley, Etherege, Wycherley. 2 vols. in 8vo.

CHARACTER OF A TAVERN, The.

With a brief draught of a Drawer. London, 1675. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 12,352, c. 8.)

CHARACTER OF A TOWN GALLANT, The, exposing the extravagant fopperies of some vain, self-conceited pretenders to Gentility and Good Breeding. London, 1675. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 12,352, d. 10(1).)

CHARACTER OF A TOWN MISSE, The. London, 1675. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 12,352, d. 7(1).)

The Town Misse's Declaration and Apology; or an Answer to the Character of a Town-Misse. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 12,352, d. 9.)

CHARLANNE, Louis.

L'Influence Française en Angleterre au XVII^e siècle. Paris, 1906. 8vo.

CHASE, Nathaniel Lewis.

The English Heroic Play. New York, 1890. 8vo.

CHESTERFIELD, second Earl of. See Stanhope, Phillip.

CHESTERFIELD, fourth Earl of. See Stanhope, Philip Dormer.

CIBBER, Colley.

An Apology for the Life of Mr.... Second edition, London, 1740. 8vo.

An Apology for the Life of Mr.... A new edition with Notes and Supplement by R. W. Lowe. London, 1889. 8vo.

CIBBER, Theophilus.

The lives of the poets of Great Britain and Ireland by Mr. Cibber and other Hands. London, 1753. 5 vols. in 12mo. (Really by Robert Shiels and others.) (Brit. Mus. 1066, f. 22.)

CLARK, Ruth.

Life of Anthony Hamilton. London, 1921. 8vo.

COBBETT, William.

Cobbett's Parliamentary History of England. London, 1808. 8vo. Vols. IV and V.

COKAYNE, G. E. (G. E. C.)

Complete Peerage. London, 1895-98. 7 vols. in 8vo.

The Complete Peerage, edited by the Hon. Vicary Gibbs, Vols. I to V. London, 1910-1921. 5 vols. in 4to.

Complete Baronetage. London, 1900-1909. 5 vols. in 8vo.

COLLECTANEA. Second Series.

Edited by Montague Burrows. Oxford, 1885. 8vo. (Oxford Historical Society's Series.)

COLLINS, Arthur.

The Baronetage of England. London, 1720. 2 vols. in 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 607, f. 8.)

- The Peerage of England, the third edition.
London, 1715. 2 vols. in 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 607, h. 12.)
- COMMENDATORY VERSES on the Author of the Two Arthurs and the Satyr against Wit. London,
1700. Fol. (Brit. Mus. 163, n. 12.)
- CONGREVE, William.
The Complete Works. Ed. Montague Summers.
London, 1923. 4 vols. in 4to.
- CORNEILLE, Pierre.
Théâtre. Prefaces et Notes de M. Mornet. Paris,
1914. 4 vols. in 8vo.
- COURTHOPE, William John.
History of English Poetry. London, 1895-1910.
6 vols. in 8vo.
- COWPER, Lady.
The Diary of Mary, Lady Cowper, 1714-1720.
London, 1864. 4to.
- CROWNE, John.
*Henry the Sixth, the First Part with the Murder of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester. As it is acted at the Duke's Theatre. Written by Mr. Crown, London, 1681. (Brit. Mus. 81, d. 22.) (Dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley.)
- CUNNINGHAM, Peter.
The Story of Nell Gwyn and the Sayings of Charles II. Edited by H. B. Wheatley. London, 1892. 8vo. See also Wheatley, Henry B.
- DALRYMPLE, Sir John.
Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland. Edinburgh, 1771. 3 vols. in 8vo.
- DANGEAU, P. de Courcillon, Marquis de.
Journal. Paris, 1854-60. 19 vols. in 8vo.
- DASENT, Arthur Irwen.
The History of St. James's Square and the Foundation of the West End of London. London, 1895. 8vo.
Nell Gwynne, 1650-1687. London, 1924. 8vo.
- DAVENANT, Charles.
An Essay upon Ways and Means of Supplying the War. London, 1695. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 1028, h. 1(1).)

Discourses on the Publick Revenues of England. London, 1698. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 1028, f. 1.)

DAVENANT, Sir William.

The Dramatic Works, with prefatory Memoir and Notes. Edinburgh, 1872. 8vo. 5 vols. in 8vo. See also Firth, Sir Charles H.

DENNIS, John.

The Comical Gallant . . . To which is added an Account of the Taste in Poetry by J. D. London, 1702. 4to.

Original Letters, familiar, moral and critical. London, 1721. 2 vols. in 8vo.

DISCOMMENDATORY VERSES on those . . . on the author of the Two Arthurs. 1700. fol. (Brit. Mus. 643, l. 24(16).)

DOBREE, Bonamy.

Restoration Comedy. Oxford, 1924. 8vo.

DORSET, sixth Earl of. See Sackville, Charles.

DOWNES, John.

Roscius Anglicanus, Or an Historical Review of the Stage . . . from 1660 to 1706, London, 1708. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 641 f. 15 (1).)

DROLLERY.

Merry Drollery Compleat. Edited with a special introduction by J. W. E[bsworth]. Boston, 1875. 8vo.

Choyce Drollery, Songs and Sonnets. Edited with a special introduction by J. W. E[bsworth]. Boston, 1876. 8vo.

DRYDEN, John.

*The Assiguation or Love in a Nunnery . . . (Herringman). London, 1673. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 11,774, d. 1 (1).) (Dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley.)

Of Dramatick Poesie, An Essay. By John Dryden, Esq. London, 1668. 4to. (Brit. Mus. C. 59, ff. 19.)

The Satires of Decimus Juvenalis Translated by Mr. Dryden and Several Other Eminent Hands. London, 1693. Fol. (Brit. Mus. 75, h. 10.)

Mack Flecknoe, or a Satyr upon the true-blew-protestant poet T.S. London, 1682. 4to. (Brit. Mus. C. 71, e. 8.)

The Works of John Dryden edited by Sir Walter Scott, with a Life of the Author, 1821. Edinburgh and London. 18 vols. in 8vo.

The Poetical Works, ed. G. R. Noyes. Cambridge, U.S.A., 1909. 8vo.

The Critical and Miscellaneous Works of John Dryden. With an . . . Account of the Life and Writings of the Author . . . by Edmond Malone, Esq. London, 1800. 3 vols. in 8vo.

Essays selected and edited by W. P. Ker. Oxford, 1900. 2 vols. in 8vo.

See also Saintsbury, George, and Van Doren, Mark.

D'URFEY, Thomas.

*The Intrigues at Versailles: or a Jilt in all Humours. London, 1697. 4to. (Dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley and his son.) (Brit. Mus. 644, h. 24.)

EACHARD, Laurence.

*Plautus's Comedies, Amphitryon, Epidicus, and Rudens, made English: . . . by L. E. London, 1694. 8vo. (Dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley.) (Brit. Mus. 11,707, bbb. 8.)

EBSWORTH, J. See Drollery.

ELLIS CORRESPONDENCE. The Letters written during the Years 1686, 1687, 1688, addressed to J. Ellis, Esq. Edited by the Hon. G. A. E. London, 1829. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 1086, g. 23.)

ETHEREGE, Sir George.

The Man of Mode, or S^r Fopling Flutter, A Comedy . . . London, 1676. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 644, h. 35.)

The Works of Sir George Etherege, containing his Plays and Poems. London, 1704. 8vo.

The Works of Sir George Etherege. Plays and Poems. Edited, with critical notes, by A. W. Verity. London, 1888. 8vo.

EVELYN, John.

A Character of England. As it was lately presented in a Letter to a Noble Man of France. By J. E[velyn]. London, 1659. 12mo. (Brit. Mus. 292, a. 43.)

The Diary. Edited with an Introduction by Austin Dobson. London, 1906. 3 vols. in 8vo.

FAITHORNE, W. See Newcourt and Faithorne.

FEA, Allan.

James II and his Wives. Methuen: London, 1908. 8vo. See also Hamilton, Anthony.

FELL-SMITH, Charlotte.

Mary Rich, Countess of Warwick. London, 1901.

FELTON, Henry.

A Dissertation on reading the Classics and forming a just style. London, 1713. (Brit. Mus. 1088, d. 27.)

FENTON, Elijah.

Poems on Several Occasions. London, 1717. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 993, k. 8.)

FIRTH, Sir Charles H.

Cambridge History of English Literature, Vol. V. ch. v.: "The Stewart Restoration."

English Historical Review, Vol. XVIII, p. 319: "Some Observations concerning the People of England." Printed from Sir William Davenant's MS.

FORGUES, E. D.

John Wilmot, Comte de Rochester: Revue des Deux Mondes, August, September, 1857.

FOSTER, Joseph.

Alumni Oxonienses, Early series. The Members of the University of Oxford, 1500-1714. London, 1891. 4 vols. in 4to.

GARDINER, Rev. R. B.

The Registers of Wadham College, 1613-1719.
London, 1889. 8vo.

GENEST, Rev. John.

Some Account of the English Stage, etc. London,
1832. 10 vols. in 8vo.

GENTLEMAN'S JOURNAL, The; or The Monthly Miscellany. London, 1691/2-1694. (Brit. Mus. PP. 5255 (1) and (2).)

GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE, The; or Monthly Intelligence. (See references in footnotes.)

GILDON, Charles: edited by.

A New Miscellany of Original Poems on Several Occasions. London, 1701. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 1077, l. 12.)

GOODWIN, Gordon.

Letter in Notes and Queries. S. IX. I, 32. See also Hamilton, Anthony.

GOSSE, Sir Edmund.

Seventeenth-Century Studies. Third edition. London, 1897. 8vo.

GRANGER, Rev. James.

A Biographical History of England. London, 1769-74. 3 vols. in 8vo. Edited M. Noble. London, 1806. 3 vols. in 8vo.

GREY, Hon. Anchitell.

Debates of the House of Commons from 1667 to 1694, collected by A. G. London, 1769. 10 vols. in 8vo.

HALIFAX, first Marquis and first Earl of. See Savile, George, and Montague, Charles.

HAMILTON, Anthony.

Memoirs du Chevalier De Grammont... avec introduction, commentaire, etc. par M. G. Brunet. Paris, 1859. 8vo.

Memoirs of Count Gramont, ed. Gordon Goodwin. London, 1903. 2 vols. in 8vo.

Memoirs of De Gramont, ed. Allan Fea. London, 1906. 8vo.

HASLEWOOD, Joseph. See Jacob, Giles.

HASTED, Edward.

The History and Topographical Survey of Kent.
... Canterbury, 1778. 4 vols. in fol.

HATTON, Correspondence of the Family of... A.D.
1601-1704. Printed for the Camden Society,
Westminster, 1878. 2 vols. in 4to.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS, Royal Commission on,
Reports of. (See references in footnotes.)

HOLLAND, Philemon. See Camden, William.

HOWARD, Hon. James.

All mistaken or the Mad Couple... A Comedy.
London, 1672. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 11,774, g. 28.)

HUNT, James Henry Leigh.

The Town: Its Memorable Characters and Events. London, 1906. 8vo.

HYDE, Edward, first Earl of Clarendon.

The Life of, etc. . . . Written by himself.
Oxford. 1857. 3 vols. in 8vo.

History of the Great Rebellion. Oxford, 1705.
7 vols. in 8vo.

HYDE, Henry, second Earl of Clarendon.

Correspondence of. Ed. S. W. Singer. London, 1828. 2 vols. in 4to.

JACOB, Giles.

The Poetical Register or the Lives and Characters of the English Dramatick Poets. London, 1719.
3 vols. in 8vo. (Brit. Mus. C. 45, d. This copy contains the important MS. notes of Joseph Haslewood.)

JESSE, John Heneage.

Memoirs of the Court of England during the Reign of Stuarts, including the Protectorate.
New edition, revised, in three volumes. London,
1855. 3 vols. in 8vo.

JOHNSON, Samuel.

The Works of... a new edition with an Essay on his Life and Genius by Arthur Murphy.
London, 1792. 12 vols. in 8vo.

The Lives of the English Poets, ed. G. B. Hill. Oxford. 1905. 3 vols. in 8vo.

JOURNALS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

JOURNALS OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS. ,

JOYNER, Sir William.

*The Roman Empress, A Tragedy. London, 1671. 4to. (Dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley.) (Brit. Mus. 644, h. 43.)

KEMP, Hobart.

A Collection of Poems . . . by several Persons never before in print. London, 1672. 8vo. (Containing earliest versions of many of Sedley's best lyrics.) (Brit. Mus. c. 57, k. 20.)

KILLIGREW, Henry.

The Conspiracy, a tragedy. London, 1638. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 644, c. 57.)

Pallantus and Eudora, a Tragoedie. London, 1653. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 162, i. 37.)

KING, Dr. William.

The Art of Cookery. London, 1708. fol. (Brit. Mus. 11,633. h. 7.)

KRUTCH, Joseph Wood.

Comedy and Conscience after the Restoration. New York, 1924. 8vo.

LANGBAINE, Gerard.

An Account of the English Dramatic Poets. Oxford, 1691. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. C. 28, g. 1. This copy contains the important MS. notes of W. Oldys.)

LANGHORNE, John.

The Effusions of Friendship and Fancy; in several letters. 1763. 8vo. Second edition, 1766. 8vo.

LAWRENCE, W. J.

The Elizabethan Playhouse and other Studies. Stratford on Avon, 1912. 2 vols. in 8vo.

LE NEVE, Peter.

Catalogue of Knights (Harl. Soc.). 8vo. 1869.

LINCOLN'S INN, Records of. 1897. 3 vols. in 8vo.

LISSNER, Max.

Sir Charles Sedley's Leben und Werke. Halle, 1905. 8vo.

LL.D.

"Memoirs of Sir Charles Sedley," London Magazine, September 1822.

LODGE, Sir Richard.

The History of England from the Restoration to the Death of William III, 1660-1702. London. 1905. 8vo.

LONGE, Julia C.

Martha Giffard, her Life and Correspondence (1664-1722). London, 1911. 8vo.

LONGUEVILLE, Thomas.

Rocheſter and other Literary Rakes of the Restoration. London, 1902. 8vo.

*LOVE WITHOUT INTEREST OR THE MAN TOO HARD FOR THE MASTER. A Comedy . . . Printed for Arthur Bettesworth. . . . London, 1699. 4to. (Collection of Mr. G. Thorn Drury.) (Dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley and others.)

LOVELACE, Richard.

The Poems of Richard Lovelace. Edited by C. H. Wilkinson. Oxford, 1925. (2 vols. in 8vo.)

LOWE, Robert W.

Thomas Betterton. London, 1891. 8vo.

Bibliographical Account of English Theatrical Literature. London, 1888. 8vo.

LUTTRELL, Narcissus.

A Brief Historical Relation of State Affairs from September 1678 to April 1711. Oxford, 1857. 6 vols. in 8vo.

LYSONS, Rev. Daniel.

An Historical Account of those Parishes . . . which are not described in the Environs of London. London, 1800. 4to.

MACAULAY, Lord.

History of England. Ed. C. H. Firth (with Illustrations). London, 1913-15. 6 vols. in 8vo.

MALLET, Sir Charles Edward.

A History of the University of Oxford. . . .
London, 1924. 2 vols. in 8vo.

MANNINGHAM, John.

The Diary of. Printed for the Camden Society, Westminster, 1868. 4to.

MARVELL, Andrew.

Poems and Satires. Ed. G. A. Aitken (The Muses Library). London, 1891. 2 vols. in 8vo.

(?) A Seasonable Argument to Persuade All the Grand Juries of England to Petition for a New Parliament or a List of the Principal Labourers in the Great Design of Popery or Arbitrary Power. Amsterdam, 1677. 4to (Brit.
Mus. 100, g. 75.)

See also Birrell, Augustine.

MASSON, David.

The Life of John Milton. Cambridge, 1859-80.
(Index, 1894.) 6 vols. in 8vo.

MIDDLE TEMPLE RECORDS.

Ed. C. H. Hopwood, K.C. London, 1905. 3 vols.
in 8vo.

MILES, Dudley Howe.

The Influence of Molière on Restoration Comedy.
New York, 1910. 8vo.

MISSEN, Henry de Valbourg.

Memoires et Observation Faites par Un Voya-geur en Angleterre (H. M. de V., i.e. Henry Misson de Valbourg). 1698. 8vo. (Brit. Mus.
980, b. 3.)

MOLIÈRE, Jean Baptiste Poquelin de.

Les Oeuvres de . . . accompagnées d'une vie de Molière . . . par Anatole France. Paris, 1876-
1906. 7 vols. in 8vo.

MONTAGUE, Charles, first Earl of Halifax.

The Works and Life of the Rt. Honourable Charles, late Earl of Halifax. London, 1715. 8vo.

MONTAGUE SUMMERS, The Rev. See Behn, Aphra; Congreve, William; Wycherley, William.

MORANT, P.

History of Essex, London, 1768. Fol.

MUSGRAVE, Sir William, Bart.

Obituary. (Harl. Soc.) London, 1899-1901. 6 vols. in 8vo.

N. W.

The Refin'd Courtier, or a Correction of several Indecencies crept into Civil Conversation. London, 1679. 12mo. (Brit. Mus. G. 530.)

NEWCOURT and FAITHORNE.

An Exact Delineation of the Cities of London and Westminster by Richard Newcourt, W. Faithorne sculpsit, 1658, engraved from the Original by G. Larman. London, 1857. (Brit. Mus. Maps 348 (149).)

NEWDIGATE NEWDEGATE, Lady A. E.

Cavalier and Puritan in the Days of the Stuarts, compiled from the private papers and diary of Sir Richard Newdigate, second Baronet. London, 1901. 8vo.

NICOLL, Allardyce.

Restoration Drama. Cambridge, 1923. 8vo.

OLDHAM, John.

The Works of Mr. . . . Sixth edition. London, 1703. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 1076, m. 8.)

The Compositions in Verse and Prose, to which are added Memoirs of his life. London, 1770. 2 vols. in 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 11,609, a. 26-28.)

OLDYS, William. See Langbaine, Gerard.

OSBORNE, Dorothy, afterwards Lady Temple.

Letters from . . . to Sir William Temple. Ed. E. A. Parry (Everyman's Library). London, 1906. 8vo.

OWEN, John.

Epigrammatum Joannis Owen . . . Editio Secunda Londini, 1618. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 11,048, a. 46 (1).)

J. Owen's Latine Epigrams Englished by

Harvey. London, 1677. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 1213, b. 36.)

PALAPRAT, Jean.

See Brueys, D. A. de.

PALMER, John.

The Comedy of Manners. London, 1913. 8vo.

PARRY, E. A.

What the Judge Thought. London, 1922. 8vo.

PAUL, Harry Gilbert.

John Dennis, his Life and Criticism. New York. 1911. 8vo.

PEACHAM, Henry.

The Compleat Gentleman, third impression much enlarged. London, 1661. 4to. (Brit. Mus. E. 1088 (1).)

Peacham's Compleat Gentleman, 1634, with an introduction by G. S. Gordon. Oxford, 1906. 8vo.

PEARSON, Karl.

The Life and Letters of Sir Francis Galton, Vol. I. Cambridge, 1914. 4to.

PEPYS, Samuel.

The Diary of . . . with Lord Braybrooke's Notes. Ed. Henry B. Wheatley. London, 1893-9. With Index and Pepysiana. 8 vols. in 8vo.

PERRY, H. Ten Eyck.

The First Duchess of Newcastle. Boston, 1918. 8vo.

PERWICH, William.

The Despatches of . . . English Agent in Paris, 1669. Edited for the Royal Historical Society, London, 1903. 4to.

PHILIPOT, S. and T.

Villare Cantianum or Kent Surveyed. London, 1659. Fol. (Brit. Mus. 678, i. 21.)

PHILIPS, Katharine.

Pompey a Tragedy. 1663. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 11,737, d. 8.)

Poems by the incomparable Mrs. K[atharine] P[hillips]. 1664. 4to.

Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus. 1705, 8vo.
(Brit. Mus. 1086, b. 9.)

PLÜCKHAHN, Edmund.

Die Bearbeitung ausländischer Stoffe in englischen Drama am Ende des 17 Jahrhunderts dargelegt an Sir Charles Sedley's The Mulberry Garden und Bellamira or the Mistress. Hamburg, 1904. 8vo.

POEMS. The Fourth (and Last) Collection of Poems, Satyrs, Songs, &c. . . . London, Printed Anno Dom. 1689. 4to (Brit. Mus. 1077, h. 32.)

POEMS ON AFFAIRS OF STATE, from the Time of Oliver Cromwell to the abdication of K. James the Second. London, 1697. 2 vols. in 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 11,603, bbb. 25, 6.)

POEMS ON AFFAIRS OF STATE, from Oliver Cromwell to this Present Day by the Greatest Wits of the Age. 1698. 8vo.

POEMS ON AFFAIRS OF STATE, from 1640 to this present Year 1704. Written by the Greatest Wits of the Age. Vol. III. Printed in the Year 1704. 8vo.

POMPEY THE GREAT, A Tragedy . . . Translated out of the French by Certain Persons of Honour. London, 1664. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 643, d. 50.)

("La Mort de Pompée," translated from the French of P. Corneille by Waller, Sedley, Godolphin, Filmer and Buckhurst; see pp. 82, 83.)

POPE, Alexander.

The Works of. Ed. W. Elwin and W. J. Courtney. London, 1871-89. 10 vols. in 8vo.

POPE, Walter.

The Old Man's Wish. Broadside ?1685. (Brit. Mus. Rox. ii. 386.)

The Life of Seth, Lord Bishop of Salisbury. London, 1697. (Brit. Mus. 1124, b. 10 (1).)

PRIDEAUX, Lieut.-Col. W. F.

Letters in Notes and Queries, Ser. 7, X. 286, 505; Ser. 8, III. 388, XII. 485; Ser. 9, VIII. 157.

PRIOR, Matthew.

The Writings of. Ed. A. R. Waller. Cambridge, 1905-7. 2 vols. in 8vo. (Cambridge English Classics.)

RALEIGH, Sir Walter.

Milton. London, 1900. 8vo. See also Savile, Sir George.

REMARQUES upon the late Printed Speech under the name of Sir Charles Sidley. London, 1691. (Brit. Mus. 1876, f. 119 (9).)

RERESBY, Sir John.

The Memoirs and Travels of. Ed. A. Ivatt. London, 1904. 8vo.

RICHARDSON, Jonathan.

Explanatory Notes and Remarks on Milton's Paradise Lost, by J. Richardson, Father and Son. With the Life of the Author and a Discourse on the Poem. By J. R. Sen. London. MDCCXXXIV. 8vo. (Copy with author's MS. annotations in the London Library.)

ROCHESTER, second Earl of. See Wilmot, John.

SACKVILLE, Charles, Lord Buckhurst, afterwards fifth Earl of Dorset and Middlesex.

The Works of the Earl of Dorset in the Works of the most Celebrated Minor Poets. 1749. 2 vols. in 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 238, c. 1.)

SACKVILLE-WEST, Hon. Victoria Mary.

Knole and the Sackvilles. London, 1922. 8vo.

SAINTSBURY, George.

Dryden. London, 1902. (English Men of Letters Series.) 8vo.

SATYR TO HIS MUSE. By the Author of Absalom & Achitophel. London. Printed for T. W. 1682.

SAVILE, Sir George, Marquess of Halifax.

The Complete Works of. Ed. with an Introduction by W. Raleigh. Oxford, 1912. 8vo.

SAVILE CORRESPONDENCE.

Letters to and from Henry Savile, etc., 1661-1689. Ed. Camden Society, Westminster, 1858. 4to.

SEDLEY, Sir Charles.

The Mulberry Garden, a Comedy. London, 1668. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 841, c. 1.) (Reprinted 1675 and 1688; also included in Collected Works of 1722, 1776 and 1778.)

Antony and Cleopatra, a Tragedy. London, 1677. 4to. (Reprinted in 1690 and 1696 and in Collected Works of 1722, 1776 and 1778.) (Brit. Mus. 11,778, g. 39.)

Bellamira, or the Mistress. A Comedy. London, 1687. 4to. (Reprinted in Collected Works of 1772, 1776 and 1778.) (Brit. Mus. 644, h. 34.)

Reflections upon our late and present proceedings . . . in England. London, 1689. 4to. (Brit. Mus. T. 1675 (15).) (Reprinted, Edinburgh, 1689. 4to.) (Brit. Mus. 8138, bb. 20.)

The Speech of Sir Charles Sidley in the House of Commons. London, 1691. Broadside.

The Miscellaneous Works. Published from the Original Manuscripts by Capt. Ayloffe. London, 1702. 8vo. (Not in Brit. Mus.)

The Happy Pair: or a Poem on Matrimony. London, 1702. Fol. (Brit. Mus. 1347, m. 30.)

The Poetical Works . . . With Large Additions never before made Publick. Published from the Original MS. by Capt. Ayloffe. With a New Miscellany of Poems. (etc.). London, 1707. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 11,623, e. 11.)

The Poetical Works . . . with Large Additions never before made Publick. To which is prefix'd [sic] The Earl of Rochester's Mountebank Speech on Tower Hill . . . The Second Edition. London, 1710. 8vo. (Not in Brit. Mus.)

The Works . . . in Two Volumes containing his Poems, Plays, &c. with Memoirs of the Author's Life by an Eminent Hand. London, 1722. 2 vols. in 12 mo. (Brit. Mus. 644, a. 33.)

The Works . . . In Prose and Verse . . . With Memoirs of the Author's Life, Written by an Eminent Hand. London, 1776. 2 vols. in 8vo. (A reprint with slight variations of the foregoing.) (Brit. Mus. 12,268 aaaa. 6.)

The Works . . . In Prose and Verse . . . the greatest Part never Printed before . . . With Memoirs of the Author's Life, Written by an Eminent Hand. London, 1778. 2 vols. in 8vo. (Not in Brit. Mus.)

See also Commendatory Verses, Tonson's Miscellany, Kemp's Collection, and Pompey the Great.

SHADWELL, Thomas.

Epsom Wells, A Comedy. London. 1673. 4to. (Prologue by Sir C[harles] S[edley].) (Brit. Mus. 644, i. 24.)

*A True Widow, A Comedy. London, 1679. (Brit. Mus. 644, i. 34.) (Dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley.)

*The Tenth Satyr of Juvenal, Latin and English. London, 1687. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 11,388, cc. 8.) (Dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley.)

The Dramatic Works of. London, 1720. 4 vols. in 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 644, a. 35-8.)

SHEFFIELD, John, Earl of Malgrave, afterwards Marquis of Normanby and Duke of Buckinghamshire.

The Works of. London, 1723. 2 vols. in 4to. (Brit. Mus. 641, l. 11.)

SHIELS, Robert. See Cibber, Theophilus.

SITWELL, Sir George.

The First Whig, An Account of the Parliamentary Career of William Sacheverell. Scarborough, 1894. (Privately Printed.) 8vo.

SMYTH, Richard.

The Obituary of . . . being a catalogue of such persons as he knew in their life. Westminster, 1849. 4to. (Camden Society.)

SORBIÈRE, Samuel de.

Relation d'un Voyage en Angleterre. Paris, 1664. (Bibl. Nat. N. 30.)

Sorberiana ou bons mots . . . de M. Sorbière. Paris, 1691. 12mo. (Brit. Mus. 1088, a. 30.)

SPENCE, Joseph.

Observations, Anecdotes, and Characters of Books and Men. Ed. E. Malone. London, 1820. 8vo.

STANHOPE, Phillip, second Earl of Chesterfield.

The Letters of. London, 1829. 8vo.

STANHOPE, Philip Dormer, fourth Earl of Chesterfield.

Letters of . . . to his Son. Ed. C. Strachey, London, 1901. 2 vols. in 8vo.

STEPHENS, Anthony.

Miscellany Poems and Translations by Oxford Hands . . . Printed for Anthony Stephens.

Oxford, 1685. 8vo. (See p. 339.) (Brit. Mus. 11,641, bbb. 38.)

SUTTON, Rev. C. N.

Historical Notes of Withyham, Hartfield and Ashdown Forest, together with the History of the Sackville Family. Tunbridge Wells, 1902. 8vo.

TATHAM, John.

*The Distracted State; a Tragedy. London, 1651. 4to. (Brit. Mus. 644, c. 73.) (Dedicated to Sir William Sedley.)

The Dramatic Works. Edinburgh, 1872. 8vo.

TERENTIUS AFER, P.

Terence. With an English translation by John Sergeant. 1912. (The Loeb Classical Library.) 8vo.

THOROTON, Robert.

History of Nottinghamshire, Republished with Large Additions by John Throsby, Nottingham, 1790. 3 vols. in 4to. (Brit. Mus. 192, b. 15-17.)

TONSON, Jacob.

Miscellany Poems Containing a New Translation of Virgill's Eclogues, Ovid's Love Elegies . . . Printed for Jacob Tonson.* London, 1684. 8vo. (Contains three elegies translated by Sedley from Ovid's "Amores.") (Brit. Mus. 995, b. 23.)

TREBY, Sir George.

The Second Part of the Collection of Letters relating to the Horrid Popish Plot. London, 1681. Fol. (Brit. Mus. 8122, i. 2/12.)

TREVELYAN, G. M.

England under the Stewarts. London, 1904. 8vo.

VAN DOREN, Mark.

John Dryden. New York, 1920. 8vo.

VILLIERS, George, second Duke of Buckingham.

The Miscellaneous Works; written by . . . collected in one Volume from the Original Papers. London, 1704. 8vo.

WALLER, Edmund.

Poems, etc., the Sixth Edition. London, 1693. (2nd Part with title-page dated 1690.) 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 11,623, b. 33.)

Poems. Ed. G. Thorn Drury (The Muses Library). 1891. 8vo.

WARD, Sir A. W.

A History of English Dramatic Literature to the Death of Queen Anne. London, 1899. 3 vols. in 8vo.

WELDON, Sir Anthony.

*The Court and Character of King James. London, 1651. Reprinted Edinburgh, 1811. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 2394, d. 13.) (Dedicated to Lady Elizabeth Sedley of Southfleet.)

WHEATLEY, Henry B.

London, Past and Present. Based upon the Handbook of London by the late Peter Cunningham. London, 1891. 3 vols. in 8vo.

WHIBLEY, Charles H.

In the Cambridge History of English Literature, Vol. VIII, chap. viii.: "The Court Poets."

WHIPPING TOM; the Second Part of, or a Road for a Proud Lady. London, 1722. 8vo. (Collection of Mr. G. Thorn Drury.)

WILLIAMS, H. Noel.

Five Fair Sisters. London, 1906. 8vo.

WILMOT, John, second Earl of Rochester.

Poems on several occasions: by the E. of R. Antwerpen. n. d. (?1680). 8vo. (Dyce Collection, South Kensington Museum, 8281.)

Poems on several occasions written by a late Person of Honour. London, 1685. 12mo. (Brit. Mus. 11,623, a. 37.)

Poems on Several Occasions, with Valentinian, A Tragedy. London, 1705. 8vo.

Familiar Letters. London, 1697. 8vo. (Brit. Mus. 11,632, a. 43.)

The Works of John, Earl of Rochester, containing Poems, letters, etc. London, 1714. (Brit. Mus. 11,632, a. 43.)

WILSON, John.

The Cheats, A Comedy Written in the Year MDCLXII. London, 1664. 4to. (Brit. Mus. Huth, 159.)

WOLSELEY, Viscount.

The Life of John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough, London, 1894. 2 vols. in 8vo.

WOOD, Anthony à.

Athenae Oxonienses. Ed. P. Bliss. London, 1813-20. 4 vols. in fol.

Life and Times, collected from his Diaries by A. Clarke. Oxford, 1891. 5 vols. in 8vo. (Oxford Historical Society's Series.)

WYCHERLEY, William.

Plays. Ed. W. C. Ward. London and New York, 1903. (Mermaid Series.)

The Complete Works. Ed. Montague Summers. London, 1924. 4 vols. in 4to.

ZIMMERMAN, B.

Carmel in England, A History of the English Mission of the Discalced Carmelites, 1615-1849. London, 1899. 8vo.

INDEX

(I owe this Index to the skill and industry of my wife.)

- ABERCROMBIE, Prof. Lascelles :
The Idea of Great Poetry, 294, 295, 364
- Abergavenny, Lady, 20
- Ackson or Axton, Constable, 131,
 132, 178
- Acts and Ordinances of the Inter-* regnum, 48 n.
- Adda, Count, 358
- Addison, Joseph, 57
- Airy, Osmund, 364
- Aitken, George, 364
- Anjou, Duke of, 229
- Anne, Queen, 173, 206
- Annesley, Arthur, first Earl of Anglesey, 152, 154, 364
- , James, third Earl of Anglesey, 231, 238
- Arber, E., 364
- Archæologia Cantiana*, 33 n., 222 n., 364
- Aristotle, 327, 334
- Arlington, Earl of. See Bennett,
 Henry.
- Armstrong, G. F. :
The Ancient and Noble Family of the Savages of the Ards,
 40 n., 44 n., 66 n., 364
- Arran, Earl of. See Douglas,
 James.
- Arundel, Henry, Lord Arundel,
 160, 358
- Ashby, Admiral, 191
- Ashton, Edmund, 132
- Aston, Lord, 263
- Aubrey, John, 43
Short Lives, 5, 41 n., 43 n., 70 n., 365
- Ayloff, Joseph, 128, 221
- , William, 5, 128, 129, 164,
 277 n., 284, 302
- Ayscough, Ann, xi, 10, 128–131,
 150, 203, 209, 220, 221, 224,
 233, 234, 322, 323
- , Frances, 128, 221
- , Henry, 128 and n., 221, 322
- Bacon, Francis, 27
- Bailey, Thomas :
The Annals of Nottinghamshire,
 283 n., 365
- Baillon, Comte de :
Henriette Anne d'Angleterre,
 99 n., 365
- Baker, David Erskine, 8, 365
- Balfour, Dr., 67
- Bannister, 105
- Barillon, 15 n., 157 n., 158 n., 159 n., 160 n., 180 and n., 354–
 362
- Barret, Paul, 178
- , William, 23 and n., 365
- Barrington, Lady, 305
- Barton, Catherine, 236
- Bathurst, Benjamin, 179
- Batten, Mr., 61 n., 85
- Baxter, Richard, 151
- Beaumarchais, 270
- Beaumont, Francis, 92, 258
- Bede, Father, 123–125
- Bedingfield, Edward, 234, 317,
 318
- Bedloe, William, 178 and n.
- Beeston, 112
- Behn, Aphra, 73 n., 365
- Belasyse, Sir Henry, 65 n.
- Beljame, Alexandre :
Le Public et les Hommes de
Lettres en Angleterre, etc.,
 78 n., 202, 365
- Bellasis, Lady, 137
- Bennett, Henry, Earl of Arlington,
 109, 110, 151, 309, 311, 320
- Bentinck, William, Earl of Portland, 190
- Berkely, Charles, 176
- , Lord, 102, 347, 348
- Bernard, R., 337
- Betterton, Thomas, 82, 84, 85
The Amorous Widow, 265, 270, 365
- Bickley, Mr. :
Life of Prior, 142 n.

- Biographia Britannica*, 7, 37 n., 202, 283, 365
Biographia Dramatica, 8, 80 n., 365
Biographie Nouvelle Générale, 155, 366
Biography, Dict. of Nat., 10, 57 n., 80 n., 119 n., 133 n., 207 n., 224 n., 366
 Bird, Stoughton, 221, 234, 317, 318
 Birrell, Augustine :
 Andrew Marvell, 366
 Blackmore, Sir Richard, 231, 240
 Blake, Admiral, 191
 "Bocky," Mrs., 159, 353
 Bodvile, Eliz., 53 n.
 Boileau, 214
 Bonny, W., 183 n.
 Bonrépaulx, 15 n., 352
 Bossu, Père, 334, 342
 Boufflers, 214, 215
 Bouhours, Père de :
 Les Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugène, 343, 366
 Boursault, Edme, 334, 343
 Bowen, Sir C. :
 Vergil in English Verse, 300 n.
 Bowman, Henry, 139
 Boyle, Roger, Lord Orrery, 86, 87 n., 126, 252
 Bradshaw, Mr., 34
 Brantôme, 335, 342
 Braybrooke, Lord, 127
 Brewer, J. S., 18 n., 366
 —, John, 181, 199
 Brid'Oison, Don, 16
 Briscoe, Samuel, 5
 Brockenden, Mr., 117, 118 n.
 Brome, Alexander, 291
 —, Richard, 258, 263
 Brooke, Rupert, 293 and n.
 Brouncker, Henry, 176 and n.
 Brown, Tom, 127 n., 366
 Brudenell, Lady Anne. See Shrewsbury, Countess of.
 Bueys and Palaprat :
 Le Grondeur, 280 and n., 366
 Buckhurst, Lord. See Sackville, Charles.
 Buckingham, Duchess of, 122
 —, second Duke of. See Villiers, George.
 Buckinghamshire, Duke of. See Sheffield, John.
 Buckley, Mr., 78 n.
 Burdett, Sir F., xi, 235 n.
 —, Sir R., xi, 235 n.
 Burghclere, Lady, 62 n., 116 n., 366
 Burke, J. and J. B., 366
 —, Sir Bernard, 367
 Burnet, Gilbert, Bishop of Salisbury, 148, 175
 The Life and Death of John, Earl of Rochester, 67, 367
 History of His Own Time, 69 and n., 161 n., 238 n., 367
 Original Memoirs, 159 n., 367
 Burney, Fanny :
 Diary, 7 n.
 Burrows, Montagu :
 Collectanea, 204 n., 369
 Caermarthen, Marquis of. See Osborne, Thomas.
 Camden, William, 21 n., 368
 Campbell, Lord :
 Life of Lord Somers, 228 n., 368
 Carew, Thomas, 109, 282
 Carlell, Lodowick, 82 n., 368
 Carleton, Alice, 22 n.
 —, Dudley, Viscount Dorchester, 24 and n., 27, 305
 Carlingford, Lord, 167 n.
 Case, Prof. R. H., 277
 Castiglione, Baldassare :
 Il Cortegiano, 37, 285, 336, 343
 Castlehaven, Earl of, 154
 Castlemaine, Lady. See Palmer, Barbara.
 —, Lord. See Palmer, Roger.
 Catinat, 214
 Catullus, 295
 Cervantes :
 Don Quixote, 335, 343
 Chadwick, John, 181
 Chamberlain, J., 22 n.
 Chamberlayne's Anglia Notitia, 137 n.
 Chancellor Beresford, Mr. :
 The Lives of the Rakes, 12, 368
 Chandos, Lady, 40, 53, 226
 —, Lord, 40
Character of a Tavern, The, 57, 59, 368
Character of a Town Gallant, The, 51 n., 368
Character of a Town Misse, The, 368
 Charlanne, L., 369
 Charles, Archduke of Austria, 229
 Charles I, 25, 154, 263
 Charles II, 6, 48, 49, 52, 54, 55, 99, 105, 106, 110, 113, 123, 138, 139, 154, 155, 157, 194, 195, 227, 230, 248, 249, 264, 338, 364
 Charles II, of Spain, 229

- Charlot, L. and E., 128, 319
 Chase, N. L., 369
 Chaworth, Lady, 135 n., 136 n.
 Chesterfield, second and fourth
 Earls of. See Stanhope,
 Philip, and Stanhope, Philip Dormer.
 —, Lady, 56
 Chiffinch, William, 158, 354, 356
 Churchill, Arabella (Mrs. Godfrey), 345, 346
 —, John, first Duke of Marlborough, 136, 137, 186 n., 272, 387
 Cibber, Colley :
 Apology, 112 n., 369
Cibber's Lives of the Poets, 6,
 283, 369
 Cicero :
 Oration for M. Marcellus, Translation of, 302
 Clarendon, first Earl of. See
 Hyde, Edward.
 —, second Earl of. See Hyde,
 Lawrence.
 Clark, Ruth :
 Life of Anthony Hamilton,
 51 n., 369
 Clarke, Jeremiah, 133
 Clements, William, 317
 —, Mr., 324
Cobbett's Parliamentary History,
 173 n., 182 n., 184 n., 185 n.,
 186 n., 187 n., 188 n., 190 n., 191 n., 196 n., 237 n., 369
 Cokayne, G. E. (G. E. C.) :
 Peerage, 138 n., 238 n., 369
 Coke, Secretary, 22 n.
 Colbert, 114 n.
 Coleby, 263
 Coleman, Edward, 177
 Letter by, 310, 311
 Collier, Elizabeth, xi, 240
 —, Jeremy, 246, 331, 340
 —, J. P., 20 n.
 Collins, Arthur, 369
 Colyear, Charles, second Earl of Portmore, xi, 218, 239
 —, Sir David, first Earl of Portmore, xi, 216, 218, 236,
 351
 Comines, Philip de, 342
 Conduitt, Mr., 236
 Congreve, William, 70 n., 246, 247,
 255, 258, 266, 276, 289, 370
 Cooke, Phillip, 206 n.
 Corneille, Pierre, 93, 98, 278, 370
 Cornish, Henry, 187
 Cosmo, Duke of Florence, 150
 Cotton, Sir Robert, 190
 Courthope, W. J., 370
 Cowper, Lady, 237 and n., 370
 Crafes. See Croftes, Baron.
 Craven, Lord, 174 n.
 Croftes, Anthony, 24
 Crofts, Baron, 109, 152
 Cromwell, Oliver, 38, 41, 52, 264
 Crowne, John, 148, 370
 Culme, Jane, 137 n.
 Cunningham, Peter, 370
 Curzon, Sir Nicholas, xi, 240
 —, Marquess, 240
 Dacier, Mme., 334, 337
 Dalrymple, Sir John :
 Memoirs of Great Britain,
 205 n., 370
 Danby, Earl of (afterwards Marquis of Caermarthen). See Osborne, Thomas.
 —, Lord, 205
 Dangeau, Marquis de :
 Journal, 15 n., 157 n., 370
 Darnley, James, 157, 159 and n.
 —, Katherine (afterwards Lady
 Anglesey and Duchess of Buckinghamshire), xi, 139,
 140, 206 n., 231, 238, 239, 265
 Dartmouth, Lord, 204, 206 n., 238
 Darwin, Charles, 240 n.
 —, Erasmus, xi, 240 and n.
 Darwin Swift, Mr. F., x
 Dasent, A. J. (St. James's Square),
 345, 370
 Davenant, Dr. Charles, 223, 224,
 340, 371
 Discourses on the Public
 Revenues and Trade of England, 224
 —, Harry, 234
 —, Sir William, 39, 40 n.,
 84, 85 n., 371
 The Play House to be Lett, 82
 The Man's the Master, 106 n.
 Davis, Mr., 324
 De Bellefonds, Maréchal, 113
 De Comminges, 60 and n.
 Defoe, Daniel, 5
 Denham, Sir John, 79 n., 332, 339
 —, Lady, 137
 Dennis, John, 7, 117 and n., 371
 Descartes, René, 326, 337
 De Vere, Aubrey, twentieth Earl of Oxford, 60 and n.
 Devonshire, Duke of, 186 and n., 207

- Dobell, Messrs. P. J. and A. E.,
23 n.
- Dobree, Mr. Bonamy, 371
- Dobson, Austin, 294
- Dobyns, Robert, 307
- Donne, John, 287, 330, 331, 338
- Dorchester, Lady. See Sedley, Katherine.
- Dormer, Mr. Robert, 39
- Dorset, Earl of. See Sackville.
- Douglas, James, Earl of Arran,
56, 347, 348
- Downes, J. :
 Roscius Anglicanus, 84 n., 113 n., 371
- Dryden, John, 3, 56, 73, 79, 89,
91-94, 97, 118, 210, 231, 241,
246, 252, 264, 277, 279, 296,
299, 343, 371, 372
 To the Memory of Mr. Oldham, 142
 The Wild Gallant, 260
 The Maiden Queen, 104 n., 126 n., 260
 Marriage à la Mode, 96 n.
 The Assignment, or Love in a
 Nunnery, 92 n., 93, 302, 371
 Tyrannick Love, 104 n., 126 n.
 Limberham, 154
 All for Love, 134, 279
 Translation of Juvenal, 329,
 338, 372
 Translation of Virgil, 300, 301
 Essay of Dramatick Poesie,
 89-93, 372
 MacFlecknoe, 96, 108 n., 171, 372
- Duncomb, Alderman, 62 n.
- D'Urfey, Tom, 209, 210 and n., 220, 372
- Echard, Rev. Laurence, 210, 372
- Elizabeth, Queen, 27
- Ellwood, Thomas, The Quaker,
 History, 66 n.
- Encyclopædia Britannica*, 10
- Erasmus, 327, 328, 337
- Essex, Lady, 44 n.
- Etherege, Sir George, 13, 57 n., 58 n., 69, 79 and n., 104, 106,
143, 146, 171, 172, 246, 248,
249, 252, 253, 259, 266, 276,
282, 341, 372
 Ratisbon Letter Book, 62 n.,
 75 n., 167 n., 171 n., 172 n.,
 248 n., 341 n., 363
 The Comical Revenge, or Love
 in a Tub, 67, 252, 260
- She Wou'd if She Cou'd*, 73 n., 104, 252, 260, 261, 265
- The Man of Mode, or Sir*
Fopling Flutter, 62 n., 70-73,
74 n., 134, 372
- Eusden, Lawrence, 279
- Evelyn, John, 45, 54, 133, 157
 Diary, 45 n., 133 n., 150 n., 157 n., 161 n., 263, 373
 A Character of England, 39 n.,
 45 n., 373
 —, John, the Younger, 245
- Farquhar, George, 246
- Fea, Mr. Allan, 162 n., 239 n., 373
- Fell Smith, Miss, 102, 373
- Felton, Henry :
 A Dissertation on reading the Classics, etc., 79 n., 373
- Fenton, E. :
 Poems on Several Occasions, 245, 373
- Fielding, Henry, 64 n.
- Filmer, Sir Edward, 79 and n.,
80 n., 298
- Finch, Anne, Countess of Winchel-sea, 297
- Firth, Sir C. H., 13, 40 n., 48 n., 373
- Flatman, Thomas, 167 n.
- Fletcher, John, 78 n., 92, 258
- Floyd, Tobias, 149
- Forgues, M. E. D., 70 n., 373
- Foster, John :
 Life and Times of Goldsmith,
 280 n.
- Foster, Joseph, 373
 —, Sir Robert, 64, 65 and n., 111
- Frazer, Dr., 78 n., 135
 —, Mrs., 134, 135
 —, Sir W. Augustus, 218 n.
- Frith, Elizabeth, 235
- Fuller, William, 189, 190
- Gabriel, Mr., 310
- Galton, Sir Francis, 16 n., 240
- Gardiner, Rev. R. B., 40 n., 374
- Garrick, David, 280
- Gassend (Gassendus), Pierre, 325,
327, 337
- Gay, John, 294
- Genest, Rev. J. :
 Some Account of the English
 Stage, 111 n., 266, 374
- Gentleman's Journal*, 208, 374
- Gentleman's Magazine*, 8 n., 147 n., 206 n., 221 n., 264, 374
- George I., 237
- Gerrard, Lady, 263

- Giffard, Martha, 81 n.
 Gildon, Charles :
 A New Miscellany, 135 n., 138 n., 232, 332, 339, 374
 The Lives and Characters of the English Dramatick Poets, 4
 Gillow's Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics,
 123 n.
 Glanvil, Joseph, 330, 340
 Gloucester, Duke of, 49, 84
 Godfrey, Colonel Charles, 172, 345
 Godolphin, Sidney, 80 and n., 119,
 298, 345, 359
 Goldsmith, Oliver, 57, 280
 Goodwin, Mr. Gordon, 10, 57 n., 374
 Goring, Sir George, Earl of Norwich, 49, 263
 Gosse, Sir Edmund, 11, 246, 374
 Goulston, Edward, 200
 —, Sir William, 179, 200
 Grafton, Mrs., 160, 356
 Grahame, or Grahme (Grimps, Gremme, etc.), Col. James,
 140, 205 and n. 238, 348, 353,
 355
 —, Fergus, 347, 349
 Grammont, Philibert, Comte de,
 57 n.
 Granger, Dr., 8, 374
 Gregory, Mr., 103
 Grey, Anchitell :
 Parliamentary Debates, 184 n.,
 185 n., 186 n., 187 n., 188 n.,
 189 n., 190 n., 191 n., 192 n.,
 195 n., 196 n., 197 n., 374
 Griffith, Mr. John, Junior, 29, 30
 Guarini :
 Il Pastor Fido, 336, 343
 Guise, Sir John, 186
 Guy, Mr., 75 n.
 Gwynne, Nell, 93, 101, 104 and n., 126, 177, 220
 Haines, Joe, 114, 118
 Hales, Sir Edward, 24, 321
 Hall, "Jack," 145
 —, John, 146
 —, Dr. John, 146
 Hamilton, Anthony, 67, 68, 374
 Mémoires de Grammont, 50 n., 53 n., 56, 57 n., 70, 252, 256,
 374
 —, George, 67, 309
 Harding, George, 8 n.
 Harley, Robert, 176, 199, 200
 "Harry the 8th," 81 n.
 Hart, Charles, 84, 101, 220
 Harvey, Thomas, 21 n.
 Harwood, Mr. A. C., 13
 Haslewood, Joseph :
 Notes by, 9, 15 n., 24 n., 26 n., 147 n., 225 n., 235 n., 320—
 323, 375
 Hasted's Kent, 20 n., 179 n.,
 197 n., 201 n., 375
 Hatton Correspondence, 53 n., 375
 Hatton, Lord, 53 n.
 Haward, Sir William, MSS. of,
 177 and n., 363
 Hazlitt, William, 246, 276
 Hédelin, Abbé François, 340
 Hele, Sir John, 137 n.
Heliodorus, his Aethiopian History,
 23
 Henrietta Maria, Queen, 29
 Henriette, Madame, Duchesse d'Orléans ("Henriette d'Angleterre"), 98, 113, 114
 Henry VIII, 18
 Henshaw, Mr., 96, 114 n.
Heraclius, 82 and n.
 Herbert, Lord of Cherbury, 46 n.
 —, Arthur, Earl of Torrington, 216
 —, Sir Henry, 84
 Herringman, Henry, 74, 82
 Hervie, Dr. Robert, 23
 Hewitt, Prof. R. M., 13
 —, Sir George, 47 n.
 —, Sir John, 47 and n., 145
 Heywood, 275
 Hogarth, 58 and n.
 Holland, Philemon, 21 n.
 —, Lord, 118
 Hollis, Lord, 99
 Holt, 319
 "Hood, Eustace," 9, 221
 Horace, 93, 232, 282, 286, 290,
 299, 327, 337
 Hough, Bishop :
 Table Talk, 204 n.
 Howard, James :
 All Mistaken, 270, 375
 —, Sir Robert, 79 n., 89—92,
 118, 191, 258
 The Duke of Lerma, 126 n.
 Howe, Jack, 146
 Howitt :
 The Northern Heights of London,
 233 n.
 Hughes, Margaret, 127 and n.
 Hungerford, Sir Henry, 137
 Hunt, Leigh, 246, 375
 Hyde, Edward, first Earl of

- Clarendon, 29, 36, 41, 45, 51, 52, 54, 55, 63
 Hyde, Henry, second Earl of Clarendon, 204, 347, 375
 —, Lawrence, Earl of Rochester, 159, 348, 353
- Isaacs, Mr. J., 13
 Isaak, Jane, 19
 —, Sir Edward, of Bekesbourn, 19
- Jacob, Giles :
The Poetical Register, 5, 9, 375
- James I, 28, 263
 James II (James, Duke of York), 49, 56, 84, 109, 156–164, 172, 174, 184, 185, 195, 216, 219, 228, 231, 236, 238, 310, 311, 345, 348, 352–362
 James, Mrs., 127
 Jeffreys, Judge, 62 n., 187
 Jennings, Sarah. See Marlborough, Duchess of.
 Jepson, Mr., 167 n., 172
 Jervois, Mr., 235
 Jesse, John Heneage :
Memoirs of the Courts of England under the Stuarts, 9, 218 n., 375
 Johnson, Dr., 7, 51, 57, 61 n., 141, 375
 Jonson, Ben, 38, 62 n., 78 n., 90, 92, 257, 258, 286, 291
Volpone, 62 n.
The Silent Woman, 84, 92
 Joyner, Sir William, 119, 376
 Juvenal, 286, 297 and n., 325, 326, 329
- Katherine of Braganza, 106, 122
 Keble's Reports, 61 n., 63
 Extract from, 308, 309
 Kemp, Hobart :
A Collection of Poems, 100 and n., 126 n., 129 n., 376
 Kennet, Basil, 330, 340
 Kéroualle, Louise de, Duchess of Portsmouth, 116, 133, 152, 154, 157, 159, 238, 353, 355
 Killigrew, Harry, 66
 —, Henry, 280, 281, 376
 —, Thomas, 88, 111
 King, Dr. Edmund, 233
 —, Dr. William :
The Art of Cookery, 58 n., 264, 376
 Kirke, Major-General, 207 and n.
 Knatchbull, Dame Mary, 123
 —, Norton, 176
- Knipp, Mrs. Mary, 104, 107, 126 and n., 247
 Krutch, J. W. :
Comedy and Conscience after the Restoration, 224, 376
 Kynaston, Edward, 111, 241, 318
- La Bruyère, 333, 342
 La Fayette, Mme. de, 98
 La Fontaine :
L'Eunuque, 269
 La Thuillerie, Juvenon de :
Crispin Bel Esprit, 333, 341
 Lamb, Charles, 246, 267
 Landor, W. S., 295
 Langbaine, Gerard :
An Account of the English Dramatick Poets, 4, 318, 376
 Langhorne, Dr. J., 8, 284 and n., 376
 Langston, Anthony, 24, 321
 L'Arivey, Pierre de, 335, 341
 Laud, Archbishop, 25, 29 and n.
 Lawrence, Mr. W. J., 13, 376
 "LL.D.," 9, 18 n., 19 n., 377
 Leigh, Ed., 317
 Le Neve, Peter :
Knights, 61 n., 203 n., 376
MS. Diary, 139 n., 363
 Lenthall, Speaker, 263
 L'Hermitage, 215 n.
 Lionne, 60 n.
 "Lisideius," 8, 15 n., 89 n.
 Lissner, Max, 11, 377
 Lloyd, William, Bishop of St. Asaph, 204
 Locke, John, 97, 330, 339
 Locker-Lampson, 294
 Lockett, Adam, 58
London Magazine, 9
 Long, Mr., 58
 —, Mrs., 58
 Longe, J. G., 81, 377
 Longueville, Thomas, 245, 283 and n., 377
 Louis XIV, 97–99, 113–116, 155, 159, 214, 229, 354
 Lovelace, Richard, 255 n., 291
 Lowe, R., 84 n., 86 n., 88 n., 107 n., 377
 Lowther, 186 n.
 Lucan, 230
 Ludlow, Edmund :
Memoirs, 264 and n.
 Luttrell, Narcissus :
Brief Relation, 11 n., 12, 61 n., 146 n., 155 n., 206 n., 224 n., 228 n., 236 n., 238 n., 377
 Luxembourg, Duc de, 214

- Lydgate, John :
 "Bochas," 19, 329, 338
 Lysons, Rev., 9 n., 53 n., 377
- Macaulay, Lord, 245
 History of England, 9, 60,
 146 n., 150 n., 159 and n.,
 173 n., 182 n., 192 and n.,
 215 n., 231 n., 377
Mall, or The Modish Lovers,
 The, 263
 Mallarmé, 286
 Malone, Edmund, 8, 15 n., 89 n., 320
 Manningham, John :
 Diary, 20 n., 378
 Marlborough, Duchess of, 136
 and n., 206
 Martial, 286, 295, 301
 Marvell, Andrew, 95, 175, 177 n., 201, 378
 Mary II, Queen, 173, 185, 186,
 205, 206, 360
 Mary of Modena, 133, 137, 160,
 162, 189, 345, 353, 361, 362
 Masson, D. :
 Life of Milton, 94, 378
 May, Bab, 109, 110
 Mazarin, Duchesse de, 133, 152,
 163
 Menander, 267
Middlesex County Records, 39 n.
 Middleton, Lord, 171 n., 359
 Miles, D. H., 378
 Milton, John, 53, 75, 76, 93-95, 296
 Arcades, 53
 Eiconoclastes, 330, 337
 Literae Cromwellii, 328, 337
 Paradise Lost, 71, 91 n., 94 n., 95, 331, 338
 Pro Populo Angl. Def., 328, 337
 Misson, H. de V. :
 Mémoires, 59 n., 86 n., 378
 Mohun, Michael, 84, 220
 Molière, Jean Baptiste Poquelin
 de, 98, 99, 249, 270, 378
 Le Médecin Malgré Lui, 99
 Le Misanthrope, 99
 L'Escole des Maris, 249, 250
 Monk, George, Duke of Albemarle, 48, 60, 83
 Monmouth, Earl of, 186 n.
 —, Duke of, 341
 Montague, Charles, Earl of Halifax, 141, 148 n., 164 n., 165,
 174 n., 176, 180 n., 181 n., 189, 378
 MS. Satire, by, 311-314
 Montague, Lord, 115 n.
 Montague Summers, Rev., 73 n.,
 167 n., 302 and n., 378
 Morant's Essex, 128 n., 379
Morrison Collection, 346
 Motteux, Peter :
 The Gentleman's Journal, 208
 Mulgrave, Lord. See Sheffield,
 John.
 Musgrave, Sir W., 379
 Mynors Bright, Rev., 62
- "N. W." :
 The Refin'd Courtier, 341, 379
 Nabbes, Thomas, 258, 263
 Nelson, Mr., 346
 Newcastle, Duke of, 78 n., 112 n., 265
Newcourt and Faithorne's Map,
 74 n., 379
 Newdegate-Newdigate, Lady
 A. E. :
 Cavalier and Puritan, 135 n., 210 n., 220 n., 226 n., 379
 Newdigate, Amphilis, 220
 —, Frances (afterwards Lady Sedley), 210-214, 219, 225,
 233, 235, 323
 —, Sir Francis, 13, 222 n.
 —, Sir Richard, 182, 210-214,
 219-223, 323, 379
 Newton, Sir Isaac, 236
 Nicholas, Secretary, 22
 Nicoll, Prof. Allardyce, 100 n.,
 247 and n., 379
 "Norfolk, Cardinal of," 310
 Norfolk, sixth Duke of, 164
 Nottingham, Earl of, 186 n., 205 n.
- Oates, Titus, 177, 190
 Ogle, Sir Thomas, 61
 Oglethorpe, Col., 353
 Oldham, John, 96, 141, 248, 379
 Oldys, William, 8-10, 67 n., 68 n., 70 n., 79 n., 111 n., 128 and
 n., 318-320, 379
 "Orange Moll," 106
 Orinda. See Phillips, Katherine.
 Ormonde, Duke of, 51, 54, 63, 154,
 158, 159, 178 n.
 Orrery, Lord. See Boyle, Roger.
 Osborne, Dorothy, Letters of,
 45 n., 83 n., 379
 —, Lady, 174 n.
 —, Thomas, Earl of Danby (afterwards Marquis of Caermarthen), 186 and n.,
 205, 310 n.

- Ovid, 286, 302
 Owen, John, 42
 —, John, 21 n., 328, 337, 379
 Oxford, Earl of. See De Vere, Aubrey.
 "Oxford Kate," 59 and n.
- Page, T. E., 299 and n.
 Palgrave, Sir Francis, 284
 Palmer, Barbara, née Barbara Villiers (afterwards Lady Castlemaine and Duchess of Cleveland), 44, 54, 116, 123, 133, 271
 —, John, 246, 380
 —, Roger, Earl of Castlemaine, 54, 123
Parke's Hampstead, 233 n.
 Parry, Judge A. E., 64 n., 65 n., 379, 380
 Partridge, Mrs., 68, 319
 Pascal, 97
 Paston, Sir W., 46 n., 48 n.
 —, Sir R., 73 n., 96, 114 n., 117 n.
 Paul, St., 196
 —, H. G., 380
 Peacham, Henry, 65 n., 285
The Compleat Gentleman, 65 n., 380
 Pearson, Prof. Karl, 16 n., 240 n., 380
 Pembroke, Thomas Herbert, Earl of, 186 n.
 Penn, William, 204
 Pepys, Samuel, 49, 53, 59, 62, 75, 86, 100, 101, 105, 107, 247, 248, 249, 252, 254, 264
Diary of, 10, 49 n., 53 n., 57 n., 59 n., 60 n., 61 n., 62 n., 63 n., 64 n., 67 n., 75 n., 81 n., 84 n., 85 n., 87 n., 88 n., 99 n., 101 n., 103 n., 104 n., 105 n., 106 n., 107 n., 109 n., 110 n., 111 n., 112 n., 176 n., 247 n., 248 n., 264 n., 380
 Perrault, 333, 342
 Perry, H. T. E., 380
 Persall, William, 46 n., 48 n.
 Perwich, Mr., 116, 380
 Petre, Father, 162
 Philipot, S. and T. :
Villare Cantianum, 17 n., 380
 Philips, Sir John, 223
 —, Katherine (Orinda), 79 n., 81 and n., 82 n., 331, 339, 380
 "Philomela." See Mrs. Rowe.
 Pierce, Mr., 101, 264
 Plautus, 327, 328, 337
 Plückhahn, E., 11 and n., 381
 Plutarch, 279, 325, 327, 334, 336, 337
 Poe, Edgar Allan, 286
Poems on State Affairs, 77, 145 n., 381
 Pollexfen, 319
 Polwarth, 238 n.
 Pope, Alexander, 233 n., 283, 286 n., 291, 381
 —, Dr. Walter, 42 and n., 381
 Porter, James, 114 n., 117
 Portmore, first Earl of. See Colyear, Sir David.
 —, second Earl of. See Colyear, Charles.
 Poussin, 230
 Powle, Henry, 173
 Preston, Lord, 204, 205, 353, 355
 Prideaux, Col. W. F., x, 10, 63 n., 209 n., 363, 381
 Prior, Matthew, 142, 164, 283, 294, 298, 382
 Pulteney, J., 218 n.
 Pynson, 19, 338
- Quick, 280
- Rabbet, Mr., 25, 34
 Rabutin, Bussy de, 98
 Racine, 97, 98, 334, 341
Alexandre, 98
 Radcliffe, Dr., 236
 Raines, Richard, 317
 Raleigh, Prof. Sir W., 6 n., 14, 285, 382
 —, Sir Walter, 27
 Rayney, Sir J., 22 n.
 Reading, Mr., 49
 Reeve, Mrs., 264
 Reresby, Sir John :
Memoirs, 62 n., 382
 Rhodes, John, 83, 84
 Rich, Mary, Countess of Warwick, 102 and n.
 Richards, Mr. Will, 172 n., 248
 Richardson, Jonathan, 94 and n., 382
 Richelieu, Cardinal, 54
 Richmond and Lennox, Duke and Duchess of. See Stuart, Frances and Charles.
 Rivers, Earl. See Savage.
 Robartes, Lady, 102
 Robethon, 238 n.
 Robinson, Dr. Tancred, 94
 Roos, Lord, 135 n., 136 n.
 Rowe, Mrs. ("Philomela"), 166 n.

Rowe, Sir Thomas, 211 and n., 212
Royal Society, The, 41 and n.
Rugge's Diurnall, 49 n., 363
 Rupert, Prince, 128
 Russell, Edward, 186, 191

Sacheverell, William, 176, 182 n.
 Sackville, Lord of Knole Park,
 13, 207 n., 215 n., 363
 —, Charles, Lord Buckhurst (afterwards Earl of Dorset and Middlesex), 55, 57, 60, 61,
 64, 65 n., 67 and n., 69, 78 n., 79 n., 80 and n., 89–91, 94, 96,
 101, 106, 108, 110, 114 and n.,
 116, 118, 135, 144, 156 and n.,
 169 n., 178, 186 n., 207, 208,
 211, 212, 231, 259, 282, 285,
 294, 295, 298, 320, 382

—, Edward, 65 n.
 —, Richard, fifth Earl of Dorset, 40

Sackville-West, Hon. V. M., 382

Saintsbury, Prof. G., 246, 382

Sanderson, Sir W., 28 n.

Sappho, 295

Savage, John, second Earl Rivers, 40

—, John, third Earl Rivers,
 46 and n., 120

—, Katherine. See Sedley,
 Lady Katherine.

—, Mary (afterwards Mary Killigrew), 44, 66

Savile, Ann, 24

—, Lady Ann, 152

—, Elizabeth. See Sedley,
 Lady Elizabeth.

—, George, Marquis of Halifax,
 152, 155, 176, 190, 382

The Lady's New Year's Gift,
 332, 341 and n.

—, Henry, 55, 78 n., 106, 144 n.

—, Sir Henry, 21, 22 and n., 37, 325, 337

Saye and Sele, Lord, 30

Scarborough, Earl of, 221

Scroope, Sir Car, 41 n., 78 n., 134, 135

Scudéry, Madeleine de, 338

Sedleian Lecture, 21

Sedley, Anna, xi, 24 n.

—, Anne, xi, 225

—, Sir Charles, of Ightam St.
 Cleers, x, 22, 225, 323

—, Sir Charles, fifth Bart., the Poet:

 ancestry and pedigree, x, xi,

 earlier accounts of, 4–12;
 birth, 26; childhood, 30–38;
 at Oxford, 40–44; marriage,
 46; fined, 47; Commissioner of Militia, 48; lampoons Chesterfield, 56, 57; frolic at Cock Tavern, 61–63; trial and fine, 64–67; as Medley in “The Man of Mode,” 70–73; seen by Pepys at the theatre, 86–
 87; as Lisideius in “An Essay of Dramatick Poesie,” 89–92;
 in France, 97–99; meets two ladies at the theatre, 99–100;
 with Nell Gwynne at Epsom,
 101–102; with Charles II in East Anglia, 108–110; caning of Kynaston, 111–112; in France with the Duke of Buckingham, 113–116; mediates between Wycherly and Buckingham, 117; relations with his wife, 120–125; with Ann Ayscough, 128–132;
 visits Oldham, 142; satirised
 by Mulgrave, 144, 145; tennis court accident, 146–147;
 letter to Chesterfield, 152–
 153; satirised by Montague,
 165–168; attitude to Revolution, 172–174; in Parliament, 175–201; letter to Dorset, 207; rumour of peerage, 209; letter to Sir
 Thomas Rowe, 211–212; letters to Sir R. Newdigate, 212, 213, 222–223, 226–230;
 note to Dorset, 215–216;
 settlement of estate, 224–
 225; satirises Blackmore, 231;
 death, 233; estimate of character, 240, 241; will,
 315–317; library, 324–344

Sedley, Works by:

Pompey the Great, 80–83, 85,
 278, 298 and n., 381

The Mulberry Garden, 31, 32,
 38, 45, 104–107, 246 and n.,
 247–263, 383

Bellamira, or the Mistress, 92,
 168–172, 246 and n., 265–277,
 383

Antony and Cleopatra, 133, 134,
 246 and n., 277–279, 383

Beauty the Conquerour, or the Death of Marc Antony, 246
 and n., 279, 280

Lyrical Poems, 129, 131, 282–295

Sedley, Works by (continued):

- The Happy Pair*, 232, 295-298, 383
Translations, 298-302
An Essay on Entertainments, 302, 303
Reflections on Our Past and Present Proceedings, 174 n., 303
A Modest Plea for Some Excises at this Time, 303 doubtful work, The Grumbler, 232, 280
 —, The Tyrant King of Crete, not by, 280, 281
 —, Sir Charles, xi, first Bart. of new creation, 225, 235
 —, Sir Charles, second Bart. of Oxtou, xi, 235, 321
 —, Sir Charles, Kt., 22, 23, 130, 203, 209, 213, 214, 219, 221, 224-225, 232, 234, 317, 322
 —, Elizabeth, xi, 25, 321, 322
 —, Elizabeth, Lady, xi, 22, 23, 26, 37, 38, 321, 339
 Letter by, 305, 306
 —, Elizabeth Rebecca Ann, xi, 236
 —, Sir Henry, third Bart., xi, 24, 25, 29, 102 n., 321, 322
 —, John, the Auditor, x, 18, 19, 338
 —, John, x, 19, 20 and n.
 —, John, x, 24 n.
 —, John, the Sheriff, x, 19
 —, Sir John of Southfleet, second Bart., x, 22-26, 35 n., 321, 322, 337
 —, Sir John of Ightam St. Cleers, x, 22, 23, 225 n.
 —, Katherine, Countess of Dorchester, xi, 3, 9, 132-141, 156-164, 174, 179, 205, 206, 216-218, 225, 231, 236, 239, 272, 319, 322, 323, 352-362
 Letters by, 345-352
 —, Lady Katherine, xi, 44, 45, 47, 120-125, 150
 —, Margaret, xi, 24 n., 25, 321, 322
 —, Martin, x, 19
 —, Mr., 305
 —, Nicholas, x, 19
 —, Richard, xi, 225, 226
 —, William, xi, 130
 —, Sir William, first Bart., x, 20-22, 37, 337
 —, Sir William, fourth Bart., xi, 24, 25, 31-37, 39, 40, 43, 83, 321, 322, 385
 Sedley, Sidley, Sidly, etc., the name, 15 n.
 Sergeaunt, John, 385
 Settle, Elkanah, 96
 Sévigné, Mme. de, 98
 Seward, Anna, 8 n.
 Seymour, Sir Edward, 151, 185, 191, 345
 Shadwell, Thomas, 4, 59 n., 79, 107, 108, 143, 178, 208 and n., 209, 241, 248 n., 258, 270, 276, 293 and n.
A True Widow, 77, 86 n., 143, 249 n., 384
Epsom Wells, 96, 143, 384
The Humourists, 265
The Sullen Lovers, 59 n., 107, 113, 260, 261
The Tenth Satyr of Juvenal, 170, 171, 384
 Shakespeare, William, 27, 57, 78 n., 90, 92, 246, 257, 266, 277, 289, 336
 Sheffield, John, Marquis of Normandy, Earl of Mulgrave, 68 n., 78 n., 144 n., 145, 204, 209, 238 and n., 264, 295, 384
 Sheldon, Archbishop, 103
 Shelley, Percy Bysshe, 289
 Shelton, Thomas, 328, 338
 Sheppard, Sir Fleetwood, 55, 94 n., 106, 119, 146, 147 n., 321
 Shiels, Robert, 6, 384
 Shrewsbury, Earl of. See Talbot, Francis.
 —, first Duke of. See Talbot, Charles.
 —, second Duke of. See Talbot, Charles.
Siderfin's Reports, 61 n., 64
 Extract from, 307, 308
 Sidley, Sidly, etc. See Sedley.
 Sidney, Sir Philip, 338
Singer's Clarendon Correspondence, 164 n.
 Sitwell, Sir George, 178 n., 384
 Skinner, Cyriack, 95
 Sloane, Sir Hans, 233, 236, 349, 350
 Smyth, Richard, 384
 Soissons, Duchesse de, 152, 155
 Somers, Lord, 228 and n.
 Sorbière, Samuel de, 335, 343, 385
 Spence, Joseph, 283 and n., 385

- Spencer, Ann, 348
 —, Robert, Earl of Sunderland, 152, 348, 353, 357, 359
 Spenser, Dr. H. J., 13
 Spinoza, 326, 337
 Sprat, Dr., Bishop of Rochester, 114, 116, 282
 St. Evrémonde, 331, 340
 St. John, Henry, 176
 Stanhope, Philip, second Earl of Chesterfield, 10, 44, 56, 57, 151-153, 384
 —, Philip, fourth Earl of Chesterfield, 236, 385
 Stanly, Mr., 114 n.
 Steele, Richard, 57, 231, 233 n.
 Stephens, Anthony, 339, 385
 Stepney, George, 165
 Strobe, Sir George, 35
 Stuart, Frances, Duchess of Richmond and Lennox, 106
 —, Charles, Duke of Richmond and Lennox, 73
 Stukely, Dr., 206 n.
 Suckling, Sir John, 39, 75, 80, 91, 287
 Sutton, Rev. C. N., 61 n., 385
 Swift, Jonathan, 196
 Sydney, Lord, 207
 Synge, J. M., 275
- Talbot, Charles, first Duke of Shrewsbury, 206, 219
 — Charles, second Duke of Shrewsbury, 234
 —, Francis, Earl of Shrewsbury, 105
 —, Richard, Earl of Tyrconnel, 162, 347, 358
 Tatham, John, 35, 385
 Taylor, Capt., 109 n.
 —, J., 329, 339
 Temple, Sir William, 196
 Terence, 92, 93, 249, 267, 270, 325, 327, 328, 330, 334, 337, 385
 "Thea," Lady, 346, 348
 Thomond, Earl of, 110
 Thorn Drury, Mr. G., x, 13, 139 n., 174 n., 177, 203 n., 209 n., 218 n., 234 n., 255 n., 287 n., 346, 363
 Thorold, John, 317
 Thoroton, Robert, 385
 Throsby, John, 385
 Thurlburn, Mr., 324
 Tibullus, 92, 93
 Tollemache or Talmash, Thomas, 348
- Tonson, Jacob, 386
 Tooke, Mr. Charles, 282
 Tourville, 191
 Townshend, Mary, 317
 Travers, W. J., 123
 Treby, Sir George, 177 n., 228, 310, 386
 Trevelyan, G. M., 386
The True Domestick Intelligence, 146 n., 147 n.
True News, or Mercurius Anglicus, 146 n.
 Trumbull, Sir W., 163 n.
 Turner, Francis, Bishop of Ely, 204, 205
 Twisden, Sir William, 197
 Tyrconnel, Earl of. See Talbot, Richard.
- Underdown, Thomas, 23
 Urquhart, Sir Thomas, 51
 Urwin, William, 59
- Valois, Adrien de, 334, 342
 Vanbrugh, Sir John, 246
 Van Doren, Mark, 386
 Vane, Sir Harry, 194
 Vauban, 214
 Vaughan, Lord, 103, 152, 154
 Verity, A. W., 246
 Vernon, Francis, 115 n., 116 n.
 —, Baron of Kinderton, 236
 —, Henry, 236
 Villeroy, Duc de, 214, 215
 Villiers, Barbara. See Palmer, Barbara.
 —, Elizabeth, Countess of Orkney, 238
 —, Francis, 203 and n.
 —, George, second Duke of Buckingham, 55, 62 n., 105, 106, 108, 113-119, 130, 266, 386
 —, Lady Mary, 280
 Virgil, 285, 300, 301, 325, 328
 Voltaire, 142 n.
- Waller, Edmund, 7 n., 36 n., 37, 38, 77, 79 n., 80 and n., 91, 201, 287, 288, 291, 298, 386
 Walpole, Horace, 140 and n.
 Walsh, Mr., 79 n.
Wandering Ladys, The, 104
 Ward, Sir A. W., 10, 249, 279, 303, 386
 —, W. C., 116 n.
 Warwick, Philip, 309
 Webster, John, 78 n.

- Welldon, Sir Anthony, 24-26, 28,
 31, 32, 38, 306, 307, 321,
 386
 West, Mrs. Jane, 8 n.
 Wheatley, H. B. :
 London Past and Present, 26 n.,
 47 n., 386
 Whibley, C. H., 11, 285, 368, 387
Whipping Tom, or a Road for a Proud Lady, 5 n., 387
Whitelocke's Memorials, 83 n.
 Whitlock, Sir William, 191
 Wilkins, Dr., 40, 41, 42, 331,
 341
 Wilkinson, Mr. C. H., 255 n.
 William III, 172, 181, 185, 186,
 189, 190, 192, 196, 197, 204,
 205 and n., 209, 214, 216, 219,
 221, 228, 229
 Williams, H. Noel, 155 n., 387
 —, Iolo, 279 n.
 Williams, William Peer, 322
 Wilmot, John, second Earl of Rochester, 58 n., 69, 70-73, 75, 78 n., 80, 89 n., 106 and
 n., 118, 119 n., 144, 167, 253,
 259, 282, 284, 285, 290 n.,
 291, 293 and n., 387
 Wilson, John, 258
 The Cheats, 47, 48 and n., 387
 —, Dr. John, 339
 Winchelsea, Countess of. See
 Finch, Anne.
 Windebanke, Secretary, 25
 Winnington, Sir Fras., 319
 Wolseley, Viscount, 136 n., 387
 Wood, Anthony à, 4 and n., 26 n.,
 28, 39 n., 51, 55, 61 n., 62 n., 63 n., 64 n., 146, 147, 183
 and n., 319, 387
 Worcester, Marchioness of, 133 n.
 —, Marquis, 133 n.
 Wordsworth, W., 297 and n.
 Worth, Baron, 351
 Wright, Mr., 306
 Wyche, Sir C., 158
 Wycherley, William, 58 n., 116-
 119, 175, 266, 276, 387
 The Country Wife, 86 n.,
 167 n., 245, 246
 Love in a Wood, or St. James's
 Park, 263
 Wynne, Dr. Owen, 163 n.
 Zimmerman, B., 121 n., 388
 Zulestein, 189

